While this great Government is powerful enough to do whatsoever it pleases by physical force, yet in dealing with its citizens it will treat them and itself as equals before the law in the adjustment of rights. That is what should be done by it in every case and in all of its departments. Therefore apply this principle as between individuals, and it is manifest that it is unlawful for the Government now to declare this forfeiture and take this land from that company which it so promptly earned once it had the opportunity to do it.

No lands are claimed for sixty-eight miles of road from New Orleans to White Castle. The New Orleans Pacific Company bought that, it being a part of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad, and the Attorney-General very properly decided that the company were not entitled to any lands for that. The grant was made to aid in the construction of a road, not to pay for one already in existence.

The eighteenth section of the Texas Pacific grant, which applies to the case under consideration, is in these words:

SEC. 18. That the President of the United States, upon the completion of the first section of twenty miles, shall appoint one commissioner, whose duty it shall be to examine the various sections of twenty miles as they shall be completed, and report thereon to him in writing; and if from such report he be satisfied that said company has fully completed each section of its road, as in this act provided, he shall direct the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents to said company for the lands it is entitled to under this act as fast as each section of said road is completed.

Under the authority conferred by this law the President appointed Thomas Hassard, a competent man for that business, to inspect the road as constructed. He performed that duty and reported with minute particularity under oath that the road was properly constructed.

On the 13th of March, 1883, the Secretary of the Interior made a report to the President, setting forth a history of the various transactions pertinent to the question to be considered, as appears in Senate Executive Document 31, page 76, and recommended that patents be issued to the company.

Thereupon the President approved the recommendation of the Secretary.

Now here was a decision by the Interior Department and the Chief Executive that the New Orleans Pacific Company was entitled to the lands granted to the Backbone company less the sixty-eight miles of purchased road. Did the Department and the President have authority of law for their action? They unquestionably had. Then the decision made was conclusive and binding.

A universal principle of law is that if an agent act within the scope of his authority his principal is bound thereby. The Government of the United States can act only through its agents, and hence this rule applies to it with full force. (2 Nott and Huntington's Reports.)

In the Floyd case in this volume, where the Secretary of War accepted or certified checks against the Government without authority, his act was held not to be binding. But in Adams's case, in the same volume, the court held that where the general in command of a Western army made an illegal contract for the construction of mortar-boats, and after they were built the Secretary of War without any express authority, but by mere implied authority, it being within the scope of his power, ratified the contract, and thereby gave it force and validity. In Johnson vs. Towsley, in 13 Wallace, the Supreme Court of the United States has declared as settled law that where a Department or officer is authorized by law to decide any question and he does so the decision is as conclusive and binding as a judgment of a court of law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, thanking the House for indulging me in time beyond that allotted to me, I will trespass no further.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, no American citizen can be insensible to the great benefits conferred on the trade, commerce, and advancement of all the material interests of this country by railroads. It would have been better for the railroads and those who invest money in them, infinitely better for the people who travel and transport goods over them, if they had been confined to the common and statute law as common carriers only. I can not but believe that the immunities and powers given to our railroad system beyond the rights and powers of common carriers, by water or other means of transportation, would have been infinitely better for them and for the country. But the legislation of this country in the States and by the Congress of the United States in its wisdom has conferred upon railroad companies powers far beyond the purposes for which they may be equally useful to the people and at the same time not oppressive in their exactions.

Mr. Speaker, it was generous, nay it was patriotic, in the States owning vast domains in the West to give to this people lands to which they had a perfect title and which they generously surrendered for the national good. It was an inspiration of American statesmanship that led Jefferson to purchase Louisiana and the vast territories included in the purchase; and in the war with Mexico this great people conquered and gave to the public still more lands. For seventy-five years the lands given to this country were held in sacred trust for the people, to make homes for the homeless and to give lands to the landless. Fifty-three millions of acres, sir, were given to the States for internal communications, for the advancement of trade and commerce, the settlement of the States, and for the purpose of education. Two hundred millions of acres have been voted to railroad corporations. In 1862 the Congress of the United States passed a law known as the homestead law. That, sir, was beneficent and generous legislation. It gave to the overflow of population in the Atlantic States a welcome to a home and a title to land where the American freeman could settle, turn the virgin soil to the light of the sun, and build upon it a home for himself and his family, and in the fullness of time acquire by his residence a fee-simple title. From 1861 until 1874 these unprecedented and munificent gifts were made to railroad corporations. Since 1874, when the change occurred in the majority in this House, not one acre has been given away and not one land grant has been revived or extended. [Applause.]

Corporations are almost a necessity and vast benefits have arisen from such grants and the works accomplished through them, but of immeasureably more value are the lands to the people of this Republic. I repeat, sir, that from 1874 to this time not one acre of land has been given to a corporation and not one grant that has lapsed by reason of the failure on the part of the corporations to comply with its conditions has been revived or extended beyond the time of its limitation. [Applause.] I must not be understood, sir, to intimate for an instant that this great Government should not be held to its contracts, bad as they were in the beginning. "Keep thy covenant," proclaimed upon the plains of Mesopotamia so long since in the dark past, applies to individuals as well as to governments and people, and is a safe rule of conduct for all humanity; and where our Government has made a contract let us fulfill it to the letter, but do not let the gift of this great Government and people be revived into life by management or artifice. There runs through this entire bill the clearest evidence of management by individuals to take a million of acres of land which should have been dedicated to the people as their homes when they acquire title under the homestead law.

This Government can be strong and the Republic maintained in its strength only by the occupancy of land by the holders of small property. History is philosophy teaching by example; and tell me in all the line of history where a government republican in form has existed where a few people owned the land and the masses were serfs or peons or small tenants. All the roads of the Empire lead to Rome is the boast of history. Armies marched from Rome to conquer and pillage foreign countries. They brought to Rome wealth and power, producing centralization and too much of the immorality they found in Asiatic countries. Such was the centralization in that great republic, that at last a few people, rich and powerful, owned all the lands of the country. A distinguished citizen of Rome returning from foreign service found upon the slopes of the Alps, in Tuscany and Lombardy, where the Roman law should have given the soldiers one-fourth of the lands, one-fourth reserved to the state to be sold and the money returned to its treasury, one-half to be given to the Roman freemen for homes. Tiberius Gracchus found in all the provinces on the slopes of the Alps scarcely one Roman freeman who owned an acre of land. Returning to Rome, as the tribune of the people, he introduced a law, and in it was generous to the rich patricians. There were political rings at that time in Rome as there are unfortunately in this country at the present day. The rich and the powerful had their following of henchmen and servitors, and when the law was proposed by Gracchus he made it generous to the patricians, as it provided that they should be paid for the homes by the freemen who had been deprived of them. It was a just, a generous, and a liberal offer. It was just to the patricians; it was equally just to the people; but the rich and the powerful would not accept his generous offer. From the tribune they followed him through the streets of Rome, clubbed and stoned him to death, and threw his body into the Tiber. Then, sir, equality and liberty commenced to decay and darkness fell upon the civilized world; learning fled to the cloisters; in their ignorance rulers could not even sign their names to their decrees. There was anarchy and pillage and wrong and oppression throughout the civilized world.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that history teaches by example. We can look back and gather wisdom from the events of the past, but who will claim power to look forward and anticipate what is in the future? That condition of the Roman republic has not failed to interest friends of humanity from that time to this. At the beginning of the French revolution, when France was entering upon revolution and the people struggling for the right to be relieved from oppression, when the exactions of tyrannical landlords had robbed them of all their just rights, reduced to poverty and frenzied by oppression the French people rose in their majesty, and in their struggle for their just rights convulsed the commerce and trade and civilization of the world for fifteen years. But in the end the domain was taken from the church and state, and France was divided into small estates by purchase.

There are 10,000,000 of property-owners in France to-day, with a population of 37,000,000. There are less than four and a half millions in this land of liberty, with its population of 55,000,000. At that fearful era in the history of the world, Mirabeau, who was a real friend of humanity, uttered from the tribune in the States-General words of wisdom and eloquence: "Thus," said he, "perished the last of the Gracchi by the hands of the patricians, who, having received the mortal blow, flung a handful of dust toward heaven, attesting the avenging gods, and from this dust rose Marius—Marius less great in having exterminated the Cimbri than in having quelled in Rome the aristocracy of the nobility." There were never words more sublime in sentiment or more beautiful in rhetoric uttered in the classic age. Burke was never grander in the British commons or our own Webster in the Senate. And, sir, mark the conclusion, the beauty of the prophecy and the purity of the philosophy: "Privileges," said Mirabeau, "must have an end—the people is eternal." The wisdom of that prophecy and philosophy is not unprofitable in this discussion.

And now, Mr. Speaker, without proposing to speak of the details of this bill, I must refer to it in general terms, as gentlemen on both sides have given all the data necessary for a proper conclusion. I have, sir, the most profound respect for the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, for his learning, his integrity, and his patriotism, and yet I find in this bill, as expounded upon the one side and the other, that this land is to be taken from the people by artifice and not by fair dealing. Old charters are revived, life is given worn-out and forfeited grants, and with apparent attempt by indirection to revive a munificent grant of this Government. There is running through the entire bill evidences of the want of title and covenant, surely things of interest to this people.

It was the intention of the American people to enjoy this rich heritage given to them by the States and held in trust by the Federal Government for so many years. If there be doubt on this subject, the covenant of the Government binds it. Let this question go to the courts, where my learned friend the chairman of the Judiciary Committee can be heard and the legal and just rights of the parties can be fairly adjudged. This is scarcely a question for a popular assembly. This is not the place to decide a question serious as the one under consideration. We perform our duty by maintaining that the grant has lapsed by the failure of the corporations to perform the covenant they made. This question can be settled by the calm deliberations of the courts provided by the Constitution. When the court sits upon the question involving the rights of American freemen I trust, sir, the judges will put on ermine that will be spotless. And if the courts decide that the contract with the companies is of such character and requires this means for its fulfillment, I say the American people will bow in submission to the decision. I repeat, "Keep thy covenant;" but if the court should find that there is management and artifice and indirection in the attempt to acquire title to this land, then decree back to the people of this country the lands that belong to them.

Mr. Speaker, the amount of money invested in railroad corporations in the United States is upward of $7,000,000,000, and that does not include the land granted by Congress. In contrast to that the taxable property in the United States is something more than $17,000,000,000, not including the property free from taxation by this Government and many of the States. Of the 200,000 miles of railroad in the world we have 120,000 in the United States; we are gridironed with railroads. Who is insensible to the fact that they have advanced the national power and consequence and contributed to the ease and comfort and happiness of our people, united jarring interests, afforded facilities for the interchange of commodities, promoted trade and commerce and the social intercourse of our people? If the railroad system of the United States prior to 1860 had extended their lines to the South, instead of to the West, on the isothermal lines, I doubt if we would ever have had that terrible and unhappy war in which so many of our people perished and which left so large a part of our rich country in poverty.

It is fortunate for this country that the vast amount of capital invested in railroads and the enormous wealth of the few men who own most of the capital stock can not combine together and make common cause in the government of this country. The citizens who control the railroads of this country are generally enlightened men. They know too well the value of this Government in the protection of their interests to attempt such a thing. If they should combine, they could control this Government and mold its destinies for the future. They could say who should sit in this Chamber and in the august body at the other end of the Capitol, and what citizen should occupy the palatial residence at the other end of the Avenue, and who should be upon the benches of the courts; and, if united, with their vast power they could say who should compose the court of last resort of the American citizen, a court that has power to interpret laws, a tribunal that in power and influence is to the individual American citizen next to his God.

Who would be the keeper of an insane asylum if the inmates could combine; who would undertake the task? But, sir, they can not combine because reason is dethroned and the inmates madmen; nor can the railroad companies combine to dominate this country by their wealth, the number of people connected with them, or their power. Ambition, rivalry stands in the way of their combination, and as yet there is a degree of patriotism which to an extent controls those in the management of the railroads and the vast capital invested in them. But, sir, it might come in the future; and while it is scarcely proper to expect such a calamity, there is a time when it is fair to object to a combination such as is presented in this bill, enriching railroads with lands which should be taken back and given to actual settlers under the beneficent legislation of our country, to soldiers who so gallantly served it in its great peril. Why, Mr. Speaker, the 200,000,000 acres given to corporations would make seven States like Pennsylvania, and the gift of this vast domain to railroads can scarcely be said to make your country strong. I read in a newspaper that a syndicate of a railroad corporation had in the West 10,000 acres of wheat. I presume that two hundred men could put the seed in the ground and reap and garner it with the modern machinery used in husbandry. Ten or fifteen men could watch and care for this great farm during the winter; but what becomes of those not so employed? Where do they go? Their homes are not there nor can they settle upon lands. Thrown out of employment, they must become what are known in this country as "tramps," and the man who would work for a living if he could get employment is remitted to the highway and to want. Under the ragged clothes of a man called a tramp there may beat a heart as faithful to the Government as yours, and no man with proper feeling will refuse a crust of bread to hungry humanity thrown out of work and cast upon cold charity, even though he be called by the opprobrious name of tramp.

A minister of the United States accredited to one of the great powers abroad, after the war, was summoned into the presence of the oldest if not the ablest statesman and diplomate in Europe, who addressed him as follows: "Your country presents an anomaly to the world. The Crimean war closed in 1856. We are still at a depreciation of 33 per cent. on our securities. You have had an exhaustive war. Nearly 700,000 people engaged in productive industrial pursuits perished, and a large part of your country was left in desolation and poverty. The debt of your Government and States exceeds $10,000,000,000, not counting the debts of your smaller municipalities. Your national debt exceeds three billions and a half. You have commenced to pay your debt; tell me, is that a real payment from the income of your Government, or is it to give you credit in the money markets of Europe?"

The minister said, "Sir, how much land do you own?" The statesman stated the extent of his vast domain. The minister named over other members of the nobility of the empire and the extent of their lands was given to him, making an aggregate like that given in this country to associated classes. States could have been carved out of such possessions as large as many of the States of the American Union. The minister said: "You manage your lands through agents and your people work reluctantly and merely to live. From these lands you get what enables you to live here in luxury. Now, sir, in my country you start from Baltimore, from Philadelphia, from New York, or from Boston, and you may travel by five lines of railroad for 1,500 miles or more. You pass through States and towns and villages where an industrious people produce what is wanted in the country. On your right and on your left you find comfortable farms with all the appointments and appliances of civilization and thrift and progress. You find the church and the school-house, comfort and happiness, and nineteen-twentieths and more of the men living upon the farms own them. That makes my country strong and powerful, makes it able to pay the public indebtedness, to maintain individual happiness and prosperity, and perpetuate the liberty of the Republic, and so long as we have credit at home it is immaterial to us whether or not we have credit abroad."

I have said when the land was given to this Government by the States or acquired by purchase or conquest it was intended to make homes for the overflow of the population of the Atlantic States, but the beneficent legislation that gave to the settler after five years' occupation, during which time he had farmed the land and built his home on it, the fee-simple title was defeated to a large extent by these vast grants to corporations. I know full well how much the railroads have done for this country; everybody knows that; and yet railroads would have come in the progress of the American people. There is no enterprise which leads to profit and comfort, there is nothing which will invite capital and money that can not be performed by the American people when inducements are offered to them. So far as I am concerned, whether I maintain my place upon this floor for a single day or for a term, I will never vote to incorporate a company for any purpose by national legislation, nor will I ever vote to make a grant to a combination or any class of people; for of all things in this country that we should have a fear of, is centralization of power—centralization here at Washington of power taken from the States; a departure from the purposes of the apostles of liberty and freedom who framed our Constitution; a departure from the equality which can only come from a republican form of government, until all power seems to be centering here, as all power did at Rome until it broke that republic.

Why, Mr. Speaker, what makes Ireland so poor to-day? The poor Irishman living in his cabin does not own it or the ground it stands on. You make a government strong when members own a part of the soil, however little, and the roofs that cover their families. The large landed estates of Ireland have taken from the people of that unhappy country their spirit. They are oppressed by absenteeism and fruits of their labor gathered by others who live in luxury; and that gallant people, with their poets and orators and statesmen, whose soldiers have fought in every battle in which the British arms have triumphed and whose blood has stained the soil of every battlefield of American freedom—Lexington and New Orleans and Buena Vista and Fredericksburg attest this—have been dispersed throughout the earth. Is it a wonder this brave people are restless under oppression? Their 9,000,000 population has come down to less than 5,000,000, and it is a historical fact that in the great famine of 1846–'47 2,000,000 people perished by starvation, and yet landlords exported grain from that country at that time.

I can not but think it will be better for this country to be in the hands of small land-owners, especially when as at present power is so centralized in this Federal city, and when the jurisdiction of the courts of the National Government has been so extended that the people scarcely find a settlement of their rights of property and person in the State courts. Why, sir, I can remember when the American citizen no more felt the power of the Federal courts than the air he breathed. When money is centralized in the hands of a few, when a few men dominate and control the business of the country, I tremble, sir, for its liberties, and wonder if monopolists shall be allowed to shape its future. Twenty-five million acres of land were recently purchased by foreign people in one body, it is said by some reports by fraud. I learned last September in California that an English and Scotch company had purchased a vast tract of the red-timber land of that State likely to become of great value and not too much of it to monopolize. I know full well, Mr. Speaker, that if you divide the property of this country it could not remain divided. Every one who has a sense of justice in his soul would look with horror upon the division of property as an act of communism and socialism. To divide would place the idle and the vicious on a level with the intelligent and the industrious. From the former it would soon pass away and the balance would be restored. In addition, the absence of all laws of primogeniture is the surest protection against the accumulation of vast landed estates. To expect that every man should have a home of his own and a part of the land would be Utopian. It would be a dream, and such dreams would be dissipated by the waking senses which come to us in teaching the actual and not the ideal.

But there is a measure of conservatism which should protect the industrious pursuits of the masses of the world. Lands having been given to corporations, if they have not fulfilled their contracts it is the highest duty of this Congress to forfeit their contracts and take the lands back and fulfill their pledges with the people made long before the legislation which gave them these vast properties. The citizens of the United States should have these lands for homes, and the Government should regard these as sacred trusts.

Mr. Speaker, I view the future of this country with hope, and I have never believed the corporations could control its destinies. As I have said, they can not combine to control it; but no one can be insensible to the vast power in the hands of a privileged class and of the influence they have in the legislation of Congress and of the States. It is an unfortunate fact that men are willing to do as a corporation what they would scorn to do as individuals, and they too often forget in the parlor of a corporation the code of morality that governs them as individuals.

At the beginning of the French revolution in 1790 there were issued nine thousand million of assignats, founded upon the public domain, from which it may be estimated how much of that country was held by the governing classes.

The issue of the assignats was a financial experiment and failed. Then came the revolution, and from it the restoration of the land of the country from the state and church to the people by purchase, and from that time France has been divided into small properties. But two nations in the world could have paid the exactions which were made on France at the end of the war with Germany. France is one; the United States is the other. England could not have paid it. England is owned by a small portion of her people. I have a sincere belief that France will remain a republic, and chiefly from the number of small proprietors.

Our Government made these vast concessions, and has also covenants with the people, as it held these lands in trust for their use and benefit. A code of morality that applies to individuals which can not be applied equally to the Government is a fraud and a delusion. But, sir, the Government should be held strictly to the letter of the law, and the people will sustain any such legislation, but beyond that not one step. No part of the lands granted that have been forfeited by the failure to perform the covenants on the part of the companies should remain in their hands one day. And it must be considered as the settled policy of this Government that no more of the public domain will be given to corporations.

My time is nearly exhausted, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps there is little more to say on this question. It can not fail to be noticed with great satisfaction that at a recent national convention there was a declaration made against the importation of foreign laborers by corporations. How wonderfully elastic political opinion is in this country! Its views are as variable and changing as the colors of the kaleidoscope. Why, here in this book upon my desk is a statute passed in 1864, under which foreign labor could be imported, and which expressly provided that the imported man could be mortgaged and held in bondage for a year, and if he built a house his house and land could be sold by summary process on the contract made with him. At that time the war was raging. To give more accommodation and encouragement to these people it was declared that they should not be subject to military duty. That statute bears date the 4th of July. It is rather remarkable that the birthday of freedom and liberty and equality should be selected on which to sign such a law. That law was afterward repealed, and did not long disgrace our statute-book.

And now, sir, waking after a long period of inexcusable indifference, the convention at Chicago has declared against any such legislation—in fact for the enactment of such legislation as is necessary to prevent it.

During the last Congress the passage of the Chinese bill was steadily resisted upon this floor. The bill first passed was sent back with a veto by the President, and it is a notorious fact that every voice raised on this floor and every vote cast against the bill of this session to make that law effectual was by Republican members, whose convention declares for the policy they have opposed. And who, sir, knows what will be the fate of that bill in the august Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, controlled as it is by the political friends of the gentlemen on the other side?

It was my good fortune to be here when the first Chinese bill was passed; and it was my privilege to raise my voice and cast my vote for it. Doubtless the convention soon to meet at Chicago will speak with no uncertain sound on this important question. Too many have already been imported, too many are here now; they interfere with the labor of the American citizen.

Mr. Speaker, what becomes of your tariff and revenue laws? They are questions that can be settled in the future. If they are not correct they can be corrected, and the wisdom is here to do it. They are questions that can be settled in accordance with the constant change of industrial conditions and require legislation adapted to these conditions. There is no man of sufficient wisdom to anticipate what the economical and financial necessities of this great people will require. Congress is here to attend to that; to legislate for their interests and their wants. But the question of giving away the lands, the inheritance of the people, can not be decided by the platform of a national convention. We have the right in this country now, or if not now in the near future, to say who shall come to this country and who shall not come, and we will not permit corporate wealth and power, either foreign or domestic, to control this country and dominate its destinies by the importation of such labor as has been imported within the last two or three years. In the district I have the honor to represent large numbers of Italians, Hungarians, and Bulgarians have been imported. They do not assimilate with our people, and never can any more than the Chinese. They interfere with our own citizens who labor, native and naturalized, and take from them their legitimate employment.

There is no question that should appeal more strongly to the statesman, philanthropist, and patriot than the condition of the laborers of this country. The wonderful skill and ingenuity of the American people has wrought such marvelous improvement in labor-saving machinery that it in large measure does the work of man until the hand of the skilled mechanic is rarely found, and there is an overproduction, and there can scarcely be said to be employment for the labor of this country; if not now, that time can be anticipated in the near future. Now, if there is any power for us to legislate so as to protect American labor it is a duty we owe to the people to do so. And we can do it on this question, for I can not but believe that if the public lands had been reserved for the purpose for which they were intended and that the crowded population of the East could go West and find homes there, great good would be done. We are growing in population; and the lands now illegally held by corporations under grants that have been forfeited or being acquired in vast tracts by foreign capitalists would afford in the future homes for millions of American freemen. Let us return, then, to the original condition of things before that terrible war separated us, making the South poor and blistering the morality of the North; let us return to the principles of the founders of this Government; let us accept the Constitution and laws and live up to them; let us keep our covenant and require the fulfillment of the covenant with us; let us be faithful to our trust; and above all things let liberty and justice, equality, concord, and fraternity prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. COBB. The debate upon this bill has already extended to considerable length, and I trust some understanding may be now had as to when the vote shall be taken, so that gentlemen who desire to address the House may know when the time for debate will expire. I would suggest that an agreement be made to take a vote within the next hour and a half.

Mr. LEWIS. Say at 4 o'clock.

Mr. COBB. It is suggested that I say 4 o'clock. We have already occupied two hours in this debate to-day, and I think we can get through in two hours more. We have other bills much more important than this which we want to dispose of.

Mr. ELLIS. There are other gentlemen who desire to be heard upon this subject. It is very evident that we can do nothing more to-day than to discuss this bill; and I therefore suggest that the debate be allowed to go on until 5 o'clock.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to give notice to the House that if I can be recognized I will call the previous question at 4 o'clock.

Mr. PAYSON. How does the gentleman propose that the time shall be divided between now and 4 o'clock? How is he willing to have it divided?

Mr. LEWIS. Equally between the two sides. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PAYSON. That is right.

Mr. COBB. The time in the debate thus far has been about equally divided between gentlemen on each side.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, with all that has been said so eloquently by the distinguished gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. CURTIN] in favor of "homes for the homeless" and "lands for the landless," and in favor of small holdings of land as tending to make a strong and prosperous Government, I most heartily agree. With his other sentiment, that this Government should keep its covenants, I as heartily agree.

Mr. Speaker, we have presented to us by the bill and report under consideration the extraordinary proposition that this House should vote in favor of the forfeiture of a grant of land made in aid of a railroad, after the road has been entirely completed, every condition complied with, the cars running and the terms of the grant satisfied. And for what reason is the forfeiture asked? It is based upon two grounds: One that the original grantee was not an honest corporation; the other that although it can not be denied, even by the majority of the committee, that the road has been built, yet it was not constructed within the time limited. I propose to address myself briefly to these two propositions.

With regard to the first, grant, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of argument that the "Backbone" corporation was as corrupt and swindling a body as in all the dark days of reconstruction was ever thrown to the surface of the troubled waters of that period. Grant that in all the "carpet-bag" era there was no worse corporation than this; yet if the company complied with its contract, what has its moral character to do with the argument? I have yet to learn as a proposition of law that because one party to a contract may have a bad character the other is absolved from complying with the conditions of the contract, even though the party having the bad character complies all through with the terms of the agreement. To state that, it seems to me, as a reason for this forfeiture, answers the proposition.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that this grantee corporation which has been so assailed is not claiming this grant and never built the road. It is admitted further that it assigned its rights to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, and it is further admitted in the majority report that it was perfectly competent for the company to make this assignment. It is admitted that the company could make this assignment, not only by the terms of the granting act but by the general laws governing the holding and transfer of property. The transfer, I admit, was not made within the time limited for the building of the road. I admit that this road was not built within the time limited by the granting act. But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House plainly to the actual facts. This road was chartered, as appears by the granting act, for what purpose? I want to read the language of that act. In section 22 of the charter of the Texas Pacific Company we find this language, referring to the grant under consideration:

That the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect by the most eligible route, to be selected by said company, with the Texas Pacific Railroad.

Then follows the grant of land. Plainly, the object of Congress was to furnish an outlet to the people of the lower Mississippi Valley and the city of New Orleans by means of the Texas Pacific Railroad. And observe the language:

Shall have the right to connect by the most eligible route, to be selected by said company—

Right here I pause to remark that stress has been laid upon the fact that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company was chartered to run its road on the east side of the river and that the assignee company constructed its road on the west side. That is true. But, Mr. Speaker, they constructed it within the limits of the grant. They were authorized by Congress in the act making the grant to construct the road by the route that they themselves should deem most eligible, going from New Orleans by Baton Rouge and Alexandria, so as to make the connection; and this, it will not be denied, is just what they have done. They have built the road. They have connected with Baton Rouge and with Alexandria and with the Texas Pacific system. It will not be denied by the majority of the committee that this very thing has been done, for the fact is notorious. So far as concerns the mere charter by the State of Louisiana of what is called the Backbone road, I have this to say: The charter originally contemplated that the company should build their road on the east side of the river. Congress merely selected them as a medium for carrying out its purpose of giving to the people of New Orleans and the lower Mississippi Valley a connection with the Texas Pacific system, and granted them the right to go by the route they themselves should deem most eligible.

The company constructed the road as the charter even of the Backbone road required—by Baton Rouge, by Alexandria, and connected with the Texas Pacific road. They did not construct their road on the east side of the river; and I may remark the people of that section are very glad, as it turns out, that the company did not construct the road on the east side. Why, Mr. Speaker, since that road has been constructed on the west side another road has been built running through the State of Mississippi along the east side, exactly where it was first contemplated that the Backbone road should run; and this, with the fact that the New Orleans Pacific constructed their road on the west side, has given the people of that country two roads instead of one, and has thus operated as a benefit to the people, not as an evil or an injury to any one.

Mr. Speaker, in the leading case of Van Wyck vs. Knevals the Supreme Court has held that such a deviation is not sufficient to forfeit the grant. I read the language of the court in that case:

As to the alleged deviation of the road constructed from the route laid down in the map, admitting such to be the fact, the defendant is in no condition to complain of it. The lands in controversy are within the required limit, whether that be measured from one line or the other. A deviation of the route without the consent of Congress so as to take the road beyond the lands granted might perhaps raise the question whether the grant was not abandoned. But no such question is here presented. The deviation within the limits of the granted lands in no way infringed upon any rights of the defendant.

Now I am very anxious that this House should be thoroughly informed about the exact status of the equities as well as the facts in this case, and for that purpose shall call attention to a few facts.

It is true that the Backbone people were unable, either from poverty, rascality, or I care not what, to construct their road. The people in that section wanted a road. The city of New Orleans greatly needed a connection with the Texas Pacific system of roads. To that end they chartered the New Orleans Pacific. That road immediately went to work and tried to get this grant, finding the Backbone people could not build their road. Congress refused to forfeit the grant and transfer it to them. They then did make a contract with the Backbone road and obtained their grant by purchase and assignment.

It is not necessary for me to take up time now answering an argument which has been made that the Backbone people could not make that transfer because they had no charter. The facts are, the Legislature, without making them a party, assumed to pass an act forfeiting or revoking the charter. It is a principle so well known that it is elementary in the law that a charter is not only a law but a contract, and one party alone can not annul it. Besides that, it has been decided by the United States court that act was unconstitutional and a nullity.

I come now to what I was going to say. Then the New Orleans Pacific set about getting a transfer of this grant to itself. Before they did it, however, they came to Washington and inquired about the status of the grant, and they also inquired of the authorities whether if the grant was transferred they could construct the road and have the benefit of it.

Now, I wish the House to listen. I want the Clerk to read a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on this subject. I am going to follow this up and state a regular chain of facts upon which I propose to make an argument. First, I ask for the reading of a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office at that time.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1881.

SIR: In compliance with the verbal request of Hon. J. H. Ketcham, I make the following statement:

By the twenty-second section of an act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company," &c., approved March 3, 1871, a grant of land was made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of its road.

At a special meeting of the directors of said New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, held December 29, 1880, a resolution was adopted authorizing the president and secretary of the company to transfer all the right, title, and interest of said company in and to said grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, and to make and execute such instruments as should be necessary for that purpose.

On the 5th day of January, 1881, the president and secretary, pursuant to said authority, executed a deed in the name of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, conveying all the right, title, and interest of said company in and to said grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

On the 3d day of February, 1881, the directors of the last-named company adopted a resolution authorizing the president of the company to accept said conveyance, and to execute any documents necessary to evidence the acceptance.

There can be no doubt that when the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company accepts said transfer the company will be fully vested with all the right, title, and interest which the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company has in and to said grant.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner.

W. H. BARNUM, Esq.,
President of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

Mr. VAN EATON. There followed an acceptance on the part of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company of the transfer of the Backbone, and I will ask the Clerk to read No. 11 in that document, Senate Document 820.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1881.

SIR: The president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company has duly accepted, in behalf of said company, the deed referred to in my letter addressed to you, dated February 17, 1881, being the deed to the said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railway Company of all its right, title, and interest in and to the grant to said last-named company by the twenty-second section of an act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company," &c., approved March 3, 1871.

The transfer by the said New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its right, title, and interest in and to said grant to the said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is now complete.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WILLIAMSON, Commissioner.

W. H. BARNUM,
President of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

Mr. VAN EATON. The New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, assured by the Departments here, first, the Backbone could transfer its grant, and second, the transfer was complete, on the faith of that transfer, as I am prepared to prove by written affidavits of the officers of the company, proceeded to construct the road. It was asserted yesterday that it was constructed by somebody else's money, and not on the faith of the grant. I hold in my hand the affidavits of the president of the construction company; of Mr. Wheelock, president of the New Orleans Pacific Company, and of Mr. Barnum, the president of the Backbone company, all showing this grant was made in good faith to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, and it went on and constructed the road on the faith of the assurance of the Department here they could obtain the land grant.

About this time, however, the members of Congress representing the section of country where this grant lay, fearing that the settlers on the granted lands might be disturbed, made some objections. That was afterward arranged satisfactorily, the company binding themselves not to disturb the settlers and to allow them in good faith to purchase any lands on which they had settled not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each head of a family at a lower price than the Government had placed upon them, to wit, $2 an acre, and that arrangement was made. Now, I ask the Clerk to read No. 38, of the same Senate document.

WASHINGTON, January 4, 1882.

SIR: We hereby withdraw the opposition and protest filed by us to the recognition of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company as the grantees and transferees of the land in Louisiana granted by the act of Congress of 1871 to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and claimed by said New Orleans Pacific Company as transferees of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company.

The object we had in filing said protest was the protection of the rights of settlers on the land covered by said grant, and as that has been obtained by agreement with the company, we do not wish to throw any further obstacle in the way of the recognition by the Department of the Interior of the rights claimed by the company.

The New Orleans Pacific Company have constructed the road running through the grant—that is to say, from New Orleans to Shreveport—and having obtained the funds with which to do so upon the faith of its right to the land grant, we think that justice demands the recognition of their claims to the land.

We are, sir, with great respect, your obedient servants,

E. W. ROBERTSON,
Member of Congress, Sixth District of Louisiana.
N. C. BLANCHARD,
Member of Congress, Fourth District of Louisiana.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

(Indorsement:) Hon. E. W. Robertson and N. C. Blanchard, Washington, D. C., January 4, 1882, withdraw their protest against patenting certain lands in Louisiana to New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. VAN EATON. Now, Mr. Speaker, that settlement, after everything had been arranged satisfactorily to the settlers, was assented to by Mr. BLANCHARD and Mr. Robertson, the members of Congress who at that time represented the districts which contained every foot of land in this land grant. Great care was taken that no settler's rights should be interfered with. On the contrary, they were thoroughly protected and placed upon a better footing than they had been, or than they would be, if they bought from the Government. While on that subject allow me to say it is a fact that this company went on and completed their road (though I shall elaborate that more fully after a while). But supposing the patents were about to issue, they proceeded to carry out their contract in regard to the settlers.

Now, for the information of members I will give you the contract with the settlers and the agreement, which I ask the Clerk to read. It is numbered 77 in the same document.

WASHINGTON, January 4, 1882.

GENTLEMEN: In consideration of the withdrawal by you of the protest and objection filed by you with the Department of the Interior against the recognition of the claims urged by the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, to the land grant made by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by the act of Congress of 1871, and now claimed by the New Orleans Pacific Company, transferees of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, on behalf of the said New Orleans Pacific Company and any other railroad association or combination with which said New Orleans Pacific Company is connected, I hereby agree, consent, and obligate myself and the said company and any other company or association connected with it that the right of settlers and occupiers on the land included within the limits of said grant shall be recognized and protected as follows, to wit:

Settlers and occupiers of any of the lands aforesaid up to this date shall be given the right within twelve months from the register of the patents issued by the Government to the said company or its transferees for said lands, in the office of the clerk of the district court and ex officio recorder of conveyance and mortgages of the parish where the land wanted by such settlers or occupiers is situated, to file their applications with the railroad company, through agents to be designated by the company for the purpose, for the land claimed or wanted by them; such settlers or occupiers shall at the time the title-deeds are issued to them pay one-third in cash of the price of the land so occupied or settled by them, and shall have one and two years from that time, with 6 per cent. interest, in which to pay the remainder, mortgage and vender's privilege to be retained by the company.

The price of land to be paid by such settlers or occupiers shall not exceed $2 per acre, and the quantity of land to be claimed by each shall not exceed one hundred and sixty acres.

Immediately upon the register of the patents in the office of the recorder of mortgages of the parishes affected by the land grant, the railroad company shall give notice by publication for ten days in a newspaper in the parish where any settlers or occupiers live, and also by publication at the court-house door of such parish, the fact of the register of patents, and that the company is ready to receive application from settlers and occupiers for the land wanted by them, and indicating the place where and person to whom application should be made.

Should this notice not be given immediately upon the register of the patents, these settlers and occupiers are to have twelve months in which to file their application from the time of the giving of such notice aforesaid. Proof of occupancy shall be the same as required by the laws of the United States for the acquisition of public lands if required by the company.

E. B. WHEELOCK,
President New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

Hons. E. W. ROBERTSON and N. C. BLANCHARD,
Representatives in Congress from Louisiana.

Accepted on behalf of settlers and occupiers.

E. W. ROBERTSON,
Member of Congress Sixth District of Louisiana.
N. C. BLANCHARD,
Member of Congress Fourth District of Louisiana.

Mr. VAN EATON. Now, then, to show that good faith was kept in that connection, these people proceeded to give notice to the settlers—and I ask the Clerk to read the notice to the settlers, which will be found on the same page of this document.

The Clerk read as follows:

NOTICE TO SETTLERS.

Lands granted by act of Congress of March 3, 1871, to New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, known as "Backbone Road."

This grant having been assigned to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, and the title to the lands so granted having been duly vested in the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, by proper action of the authorities of the United States, notice is hereby given to the settlers whose claims were provided for in the agreement made by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company and Messrs. Blanchard and Robertson, Representatives in Congress, of date of January 4, 1882, that the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is now ready to receive claims under said agreement, in order that patents may be issued to such settlers as soon as the same can be obtained from the United States Government.

On application to the undersigned, stating full particulars of claim, and location of land, a circular will be forwarded containing a copy of the above agreement with Messrs. Blanchard and Robertson, and such other information as may be necessary.

E. B. WHEELOCK,
President New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

NEW ORLEANS, November 18, 1883.

Mr. VAN EATON. That shows clearly that there was full notice given.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I want to attract his attention to a point in connection with that agreement and to ask whether in violation of it the company did not mortgage the land grant and put it upon record and keep it there until last January, when they found that we were about to legislate upon the subject of forfeiting these lands, and without reserving the rights of the settlers in any respect?

Mr. VAN EATON. It makes no difference, it would be utterly nugatory if they did. But I do know this, that when their attention was called to the fact they immediately canceled the mortgage and made another one which does protect in the fullest manner the rights of the settlers.

Mr. COBB. Because they knew that the lands would be forfeited certainly if they did not, or rather they became apprehensive when they found that we were beginning to take action upon the subject.

Mr. VAN EATON. The gentleman can state his reasons and opinion in his concluding remarks. I prefer not to have my time taken up.

Now, the contract was and is to-day to allow the settlers to have their lands at $2 an acre, and until the title deeds are issued the settlers do not pay the $2 on them; they only need to pay one third of it in cash and then proceed to settle upon and occupy the lands, and have one and two years within which to pay the balance. And all of that is done, settled, signed, sealed, and agreed to. Now, if this House should declare a forfeiture and if that forfeiture should stand in the courts, these people will be in a much worse condition than they were before while in the hands of the railroad company. Their last estate will be much worse than the first. Their titles will be all unsettled; the lands will go back to the public domain, and any contract, any agreement heretofore made, will of course not remain binding. So much for the settlers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going back for a moment to follow my line of argument. I find that so far the transfer has been approved by the Department, the settlers protected, the road built on the faith of the grant, built in the direction and accomplishing the purpose for which the grant was made. What else do we find? When the road was so completed the Department was notified of that fact and commissioners were requested to be sent to make the examination. This matter was referred to the Attorney-General and these questions were asked. The Secretary of the Interior, wishing to be right about this contract, wrote to the Attorney-General, giving him a full and detailed statement of what had been done, just as I have been trying to go over it, and then he asked these questions:

1. Was the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company a grant in præsenti?
2. Had the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, at the date of its alleged transfer of lands to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, such an interest in the lands, under said act, as was assignable?
3. Is the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company such a successor to or assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company as is contemplated by said act?

The answer of the Attorney-General is of some length. I will read the last paragraph:

Agreeably to the foregoing views, and in direct response to the several questions submitted, I have the honor to reply as follows: The first, second, and third questions—

Those I have just read—

I answer in the affirmative.

The fourth question he answers in the negative. That was whether they would have a right to lands coterminous with the road they had purchased and not built. They have abandoned that. There were sixty-eight miles constructed, over which they located their road, and the Department decided that, being a road constructed before they commenced theirs, they could not have any lands, and that claim was abandoned.

The Attorney-General therefore decided this company had a grant which they could assign; and secondly, he decided that it was such an assignment as was contemplated in the act.

The New Orleans Pacific Company, I say, went on and completed their road. When it was completed they reported that fact to the Department at Washington. And here is what follows: On page 76 of Senate Executive Document No. 31, of the Forty-eighth Congress, there is a letter in which the Secretary of the Interior notifies the President—I will not read it; it is long; but I will give the substance of it—notifies the President that the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, the grantee of the Backbone grant, has built its road and has so reported to him; that he has sent out commissioners; that they have examined it; that they report it completed according to the terms of the grant. And Mr. Teller recommends that patents be ordered to issue. And here is the indorsement which follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 16, 1883.

The within recommendations are approved.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

Now, we have followed this up to its completion, examination, approval, and order of the issue of patents. Everything has been done but that. There is another letter in which Secretary Teller gives the reason why patents have not issued. I will not read it. He says it is because proceedings have been instituted in Congress looking to a forfeiture, and he thought it better not to issue patents until Congress acted.

I have thus stated the facts. I only want to call the attention of the House very briefly to the law. The position has been taken by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], very properly, that although this road was built out of time, yet having been built, having been completed without objection on the part of the Government, all the rights to the land have fully vested and their title has now become perfect; and further than that, that the Government has absolutely waived its right to a forfeiture. Now, let us see what the law-books say:

I read from Washburn on Real Property, page 450. Speaking of conditions—of course the House remembers that this is treated as a condition subsequent; that is, a grant, with a condition subsequent, liable to be forfeited in the case of non-performance of the condition—of the question of performing the conditions out of time, Washburn says:

A condition, however, defeats the estate to which it is annexed only at the election of him who has a right to enforce it.

In this instance the Government.

Notwithstanding this breach, the estate, if a freehold, can only be defeated by an entry made; and until that is done it loses none of its original qualities or incidents.

Notwithstanding the time has elapsed in which the condition was to be performed, it still remains a title in the grantor, and loses none of its original qualities or incidents. But that is not all.

And any one who is interested in a condition, or the estate to which it is attached, may perform it, and when it has been once performed it is thenceforth gone forever.

When the condition is performed there is no more condition; it has gone forever, and the title is perfect.

But gentleman say this does not refer to a condition performed out of time. Well, let us see what follows. On page 454, section 19, the same author says:

A forfeiture may be saved, though a condition may have been broken, if the party who has the right to avail himself of the same waives this right, which he may do by acts as well as by express agreement.

And in section 20:

But a mere silent acquiescence in or parol assent to an act which is constituted a breach of an express condition in a deed would not amount to a waiver of a right of forfeiture for such breach.

Then this follows:

Where, however, a grant to a railroad company of lands was upon condition that the road should be completed by a certain time, which was not done, and after that the grantor, knowing the fact, suffered the company to go on and incur expenses in constructing their road and made no objection, it was held to be a waiver of the condition and forfeiture.

I commend that decision to this House. I admit that in this case the road was constructed out of time. But bear in mind with what exceeding care these grantees went to work building that road and incurring expense; consulting with the Department, getting its approval, and spending large sums of money, as they say in one of their reports spending $400,000 on one bridge across the Atchafalaya River, the difficulties of which I happen personally to know. And all the time the Government not only silently acquiesced but absolutely, through its executive and ministerial officers, told them that the grant was good, and that they would get the land if they built the road. And when the road was all done the executive officers of the Government agreed that the road was built according to contract, according to the manner and for the purpose which Congress intended. That is the case which is presented to this House to-day, and that is the grant for which a forfeiture is now asked.

Mr. Speaker, no man can make a suitable argument to this House on a subject as vast as this is in the short space of one hour. I have been forced to run rapidly over matters connected with this grant. I have endeavored to cover all the salient points. I have endeavored to state the reasons that prompted the minority of the committee to make their dissenting report. I now would commend the subject and that report to the sense of justice and equity of this House.

I would state further that this is not one of the vast grants which have been sometimes spoken of so deprecatingly. There are only about a million of acres of land comprised in this whole grant. This road is through a section of country that sadly needs development by means of railroads; a section of country that has been neglected for years, which in all the centuries until this road was built never heard the sound of a locomotive's whistle. The construction of this road has been a beneficent work. Congress in making this grant saw the benefit that would result from opening up that lower Mississippi country to the Texas Pacific system and the rest of the world. Congress made the grant, the road has been built, the country has been opened up, and the people there have been benefited. Everybody, Government and people, are satisfied except, in the language of the minority report, the majority of the Committee on Public Lands, and I believe nothing will ever satisfy them but the forfeiture of the entire grant, right or wrong.

If I have any time left, Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Before the gentleman takes his seat will he answer one question?

Mr. VAN EATON. If I can.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I understand that the latter portion of the gentleman's argument is based upon the decision in the case of Ludlow vs. New York and Harlem Railroad Company (12 Barbour, 444), cited in 1 Washburn on Real Property. That decision was as follows:

Where, however, a grant to a railroad company of land was upon condition that the road should be completed by a certain time, which was not done, and after that, the grantor knowing the fact, suffered the company to go on and incur expenses in constructing their road, and made no objection, it was held to be a waiver of the condition and forfeiture.

Mr. VAN EATON. Yes.

Mr. GLASCOCK. That was the case of a private grant.

Mr. VAN EATON. It may be so; I do not know.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Does the gentleman see any distinction between the cases of a private grantor and a public grantor; and does he hold that equities or limitations were against the sovereign power granting as against an individual grantor?

Mr. VAN EATON. Nobody will deny the doctrine about laches not running against the Government. Whether this particular case was a grant by the Government or by an individual, I have this to say: a government, particularly our Government, is as much bound by the great rules of right and morality as an individual.

Mr. GLASCOCK. As the gentleman seemed to base his argument on the legal phase of the case, I asked him that question expecting a legal answer.

Mr. VAN EATON. I do base it on the legal phase of the case and on the eternal principles of right.

Mr. STRUBLE. Permit me to ask a question.

Mr. VAN EATON. Certainly.

Mr. STRUBLE. I understand the gentleman to assert that this road was built and completed by the immediate assignee of the first company, of the Backbone company.

Mr. VAN EATON. That is true.

Mr. STRUBLE. If I understand the majority report it was held that it was not built by that company.

Mr. VAN EATON. I know that my colleague on the committee [Mr. LEWIS] claimed yesterday that that was not so. There was no evidence before the committee of that kind. On the contrary, Judge Dillon, who ably argued the case before the committee, took the other ground and claimed that it was built by the New Orleans and Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. STRUBLE. I understand that you have affidavits upon the subject by the New Orleans and Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. VAN EATON. I have.

Mr. STRUBLE. If you have time I would like very much to have you state the substance of those affidavits and by whom made.

Mr. VAN EATON. One is made by Mr. Wheelock, president of the New Orleans Pacific road, stating that everything connected with the transfer was in perfect good faith, and that to his personal knowledge, as president of the New Orleans and Pacific road, the road was constructed in perfect good faith, on the faith of the land grant. The affidavit of Mr. Dodge is that he was president of the construction company that constructed the road. He states in his affidavit, sworn to here in Washington, that he never would have begun the construction of the road if he had not been assured that he would get the benefit of this land grant.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. VAN EATON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is it true, as stated on page 33 of Executive Document 31 of this Congress, that directors authorizing this transfer had no authority to authorize the same.

Mr. VAN EATON. No, sir; it is not true.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman further whether it is true that William H. Barnum owned 35,000 shares of this company?

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I have not had the opportunity of looking into Mr. Barnum's portfolio, and I can not answer the question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I find this matter on page 40 of Executive Document No. 31. This seems to be an exceptional case in which the Democratic side is taking an interest, and I want to know whether there is any "milk in the cocoa-nut."

Mr. VAN EATON. I suppose the gentleman from Kentucky is a better hand at hunting up such things than I am. I shall have to let him answer that question. I turn the cocoa-nut over to him to crack.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. William H. Barnum is in the habit of buying "mules," and is a prominent man in this country; and I wanted to know whether he was at the bottom of this whole business.

Mr. VAN EATON. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. The arguments which I have heard in support of it are not new to me. The questions involved in it I had occasion to examine to my own satisfaction during the Forty-seventh Congress. Before the Judiciary Committee of the last Congress, of which I had the honor to be a member, a bill similar in terms to this was considered in connection with numerous others of like character; and all the arguments which have been adduced here were presented there with reference to this bill. So far as I am concerned, nothing specially new has been presented. But very much, Mr. Speaker, which controlled me in coming to the conclusion I then arrived at has not been adverted to upon this floor; and I ask the continued attention of the House to such facts as I shall present as a reason why this bill ought not to become a law.

Ever since I have occupied a seat upon this floor I have been an earnest, patient, laborious investigator of the questions involved in the cases of the different land-grant roads where there had been a failure of performance under the terms of the act making the grant, and during the Forty-seventh Congress the whole subject was given careful attention. As I have said, among other cases then before that Congress was this. Although the road had been constructed and was in successful operation, and had been accepted by the executive department of the Government, as well by the President as the Secretary of the Interior, yet a resolution looking to the forfeiture of the grant was pending before the Judiciary Committee of that Congress.

An application for the issue of the patents for the land had been made, and upon certain representations of fact made to me as a member of that committee I addressed letters to the President and Secretary of the Interior asking a suspension of action until I could fully examine the questions involved.

At that time I had been engaged in the examination of the case of the Texas and Pacific Railroad grant claimed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a grant it will be remembered made in the same act making the one we are now considering, and it was represented to me that this case was precisely similar, identical in all its features with the Texas Pacific case, that the rights of many settlers in good faith were involved, and that unless application was made to the President and Secretary of the Interior by some one whose request they would respect and probably comply with, the land would pass beyond Congressional control before action could be had.

It was well known in the last Congress that I had made the case of the Texas Pacific grant a special matter of study and investigation, and that I was firmly of opinion that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company had not a shadow of right to the vast area of land it claimed, and that I was diligently striving to procure the passage of a bill to forfeit that grant.

Hence I suppose application was made to me to secure delay in Department action, and, as I have said, I wrote the President and Secretary of the Interior asking a suspension of action. My request was courteously complied with, and action was delayed.

Upon my return in November, 1882, I at once took up this case, and after careful examination concluded then that the Government ought not to interfere with the grant, if it had the power, as a matter of equity between itself and the railroad company, and that it had not the power legally to do so. And on that conclusion, and at the request of the entire Louisiana delegation to the Forty-seventh Congress, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior withdrawing my request for suspension of action, which letter has been a matter of public record for nearly two years.

I am of the same opinion now. I have patiently listened to all arguments made in favor of this proposed action and am only strengthened in my conclusion.

The difference between this case and the Texas Pacific is so apparent that only a word is necessary. There the road was built by a rival, hostile company, without hope or expectation of the grant, which was conveyed to it after the road, built as a rival opposition road, had been constructed. Here, as I expect to show and believe, the grant was secured as a basis for building the road by the claimant company, and the road built on the faith of it; and the road, as constructed, completed before hostile legislation was begun as to it.

And while I have always been, and shall ever be while I am in public life, earnestly in favor of forfeiting and restoring to the public domain every acre of land to which these railroad companies are not entitled, either legally or by equivalent equity, yet I hope I shall never be so blinded by even proper prejudice that I shall fail to do what I believe to be just.

I am accustomed to doing my own thinking on this question as well as every other I have to deal with here. I have, I hope, the courage of my convictions.

I was opposed to forfeiture of this grant after examination then and am opposed to it now, and for reasons which I shall give, based on these facts:

Primarily I indorse all the propositions advanced by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN]. I believe that this great Government of ours after having made a covenant should keep it. And the question which is presented to this body now as a business proposition is whether a contract that was made by this Government in 1871 and which has been performed by the other contracting parties should be by the Government adhered to and performed on its part. I do not agree with the sentiment that I have heard uttered on this floor that this Government has the power to do anything. It only has the power to do what is right; and that is what I insist it should do in this case.

Mr. Speaker, the facts upon which the action of this House is to be based are comparatively few. In the first place, here is a line of road three hundred and thirty-three miles in length, constructed as I shall insist and shall demonstrate, as I think, before I sit down, upon the faith of this land grant. Everything which has been done with reference to it, and which has been a substantial compliance with the requirements of Congress, was done before this hostile legislation was invoked. Although the railroad was constructed out of time, still it was constructed; was accepted by the executive branch of the Government; had imposed upon it the obligations of a land-grant road; everything that could be done by the Government toward its acceptance was done, and before this bill was introduced or any hostile legislation proposed as against the company claiming the grant.

This grant is claimed by the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Louisiana in June, 1875, to build and operate a railroad from New Orleans to Shreveport by way of Baton Rouge, and it asserts its right to the grant as the successor and assign or the grantee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by deed of conveyance from that company executed in January, 1881, of this grant. This latter company was chartered by the Legislature of the same State December 30, 1869, and by its act of incorporation was authorized to build a railroad from a point on the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad in the parish of Livingston to a point on the State line between Louisiana and Mississippi, with a branch to Baton Rouge. All this, it will be kept in mind, is east of the Mississippi River.

December 11, 1872, and after the grant in question was made by Congress, the Legislature of that State passed an amendatory act, authorizing the company to build its road from New Orleans to Shreveport or any other railroad in Northwestern Louisiana near the Louisiana State line, "but from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, on the east side of the Mississippi River." Now, the act of Congress making the grant is section 22 of the Texas Pacific act of 1871, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

That the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect, by the most eligible route to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right of way through the public land to the same extent granted hereby to the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, thence by way of Alexandria, in said State, to connect with said Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public land per mile in the State of Louisiana as are by this act granted in the State of California to said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and said lands shall be withdrawn from market, selected, and patents issued therefor, and opened for settlement and pre-emption upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company within said State of California: Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act.

Mr. PAYSON. Under this act some surveys were made and some work done and indebtedness incurred by the Backbone Railroad Company, but nothing amounting to any substantial compliance in the way of construction of the road during the whole time within which the road should have been constructed. Financial embarrassment seemed to overwhelm it, and in the mean time the New Orleans Pacific, organized in 1875, having the same termini, and its proposed line of route practically coincident with that of the Backbone Railroad through its entire length, all within the limits of this grant, and near the middle of it, attempted to preserve this grant for itself to aid in the construction of its line. Congressional action to that end was sought, to which I shall refer later. Finally the New Orleans Pacific arranged to purchase the right of the Backbone company to the grant and go on and construct the road, but before doing this certain correspondence was had with the Interior Department as to whether the grant was an assignable one and whether the New Orleans Pacific could legally succeed to the rights of the Backbone company. The correspondence will be noticed later, but these dates will suffice now:

December 9, 1880, the Backbone company resolved to convey to the New Orleans Pacific this grant of land.

January 15, 1881, such conveyance was made.

February 3, 1881, the conveyance was finally accepted by the New Orleans Pacific Company, and the Interior Department, on February 21, 1881, as will be shown, pronounced "the transfer complete."

Upon this recognition, the New Orleans Pacific proceeded to build the road, assuming it to be a compliance with the act of Congress, upon practically the same line, basing its expenditure for that purpose upon faith in the validity of the transfer and the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the Interior Department, and this was all done before any hostile legislation had been begun toward the New Orleans Pacific Company.

Mr. LEWIS. Did I understand the gentleman to state that no bill was introduced to forfeit this land grant until after the road was completed?

Mr. PAYSON. I say this bill was not introduced, and no bill was introduced, nor was the suggestion ever made, to take this land or any part of it from the New Orleans and Pacific Railroad Company until after it had completed its road.

Mr. LEWIS. Did not the gentleman himself introduce a resolution on this subject in the Forty-seventh Congress?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir; but that was after the road had been accepted by Mr. Hazzard, the examiner appointed by the President.

Mr. LEWIS. Does not the gentleman know as a fact that bills to forfeit this land grant were introduced in 1877, 1878, and 1879?

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman will not anticipate me I think I shall make myself understood. He does not understand me at all, or he would not state what he now states. The bills introduced in the Forty-fifth Congress were to forfeit the lands of the Baton Rouge Company and bestow them on this company.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I understand the matter as the gentleman does. And the bill introduced in the Forty-sixth Congress was for the same purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. That is so.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I understand the gentleman and he understands me. I beg he will not anticipate me, for I promise that I will not make a single statement of fact with reference to this case which I can not prove by him.

Mr. LEWIS. That is all right.

Mr. PAYSON. I know it is all right, otherwise I would not state it. I think I know something about this matter. I have been paying attention to it for several years, and so far as the facts of the case are concerned I yield to no one on this floor in my knowledge of them. Whether I am correct in the conclusions I base upon those facts is another proposition. The House may or may not agree with me there. But so far as the facts are concerned, I assume to speak from knowledge.

Mr. HENLEY. I understood the gentleman to state very distinctly that no measure hostile to this land grant had ever been introduced in Congress until after the completion of the road.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir; as to this company.

Mr. HENLEY. I am not talking about this company.

Mr. PAYSON. I am talking about it. That is precisely what I am trying to say; that as to this company no adverse legislation was proposed till after it had built the road.

Mr. HENLEY. You can not distinguish between the two companies.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not care to be interrupted further. I will say to the gentleman from California that if he will not interrupt me I will come to all that presently.

Mr. HENLEY. I will not do it any more.

Mr. PAYSON. This grant being made originally to the company commonly known as the Backbone Railroad Company, and it at that time having no authority whatever to build its road west of the Mississippi River, matters remained in that condition substantially until the organization of the New Orleans Pacific. For reasons not necessary to be stated, it is enough to say as a conclusion of the whole matter the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company became financially embarrassed or practically insolvent, so that, except in the matter of making some preliminary surveys, or possibly doing a little work, but nothing in the way of substantial performance, that company went to the wall. Then the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company was organized, having the power to build a railroad from New Orleans to Shreveport.

Mr. DAVIS. Any place they pleased.

Mr. PAYSON. Practically from New Orleans to Shreveport. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me. We do not disagree about it, but it does not strengthen my statement of the fact by the gentleman indorsing it. We do not disagree about it. The New Orleans Pacific was organized. There stood the charter of the Backbone company in the way—a subsidy land grant in its interest in the way, and the terminal points of the two corporations practically the same.

The gentleman says "No, sir." I will yield a minute to him to show that.

Mr. LEWIS. I say no, because that very act did not change the terminus of the road as fixed in the grant by Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. You say they had a roving commission to go where they pleased.

Mr. PAYSON. After the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company was organized it commenced and did everythingin its power, so far as I have been able to ascertain, to secure to itself the privileges that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company had. The contest commenced there at home. An attempt was made to repeal the charter of the old railroad company by the Louisiana Legislature in the interest of the other company. The contest was then transferred to the Halls of Congress.

Mr. HENLEY. You do not pretend——

Mr. PAYSON. I decline further to be interrupted. The gentleman will learn what I pretend if he will do me the honor to listen. In the Forty-fifth Congress a bill was introduced, and that is the bill referred to by the gentleman from California, who does not now honor me by his attention, seeking to forfeit this land grant as to the Backbone company and bestow it on the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company.

But it is asserted in the majority report made by the gentleman from Louisiana that nothing was done with reference to it in that Congress whatever. I am authorized to state by gentlemen now members of this Congress that the Committee on the Pacific Railroads of that Congress having this matter before them unanimously voted to report a bill declaring the grant forfeited as to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company and bestow it on this company. That report was prepared by Mr. Elam, then a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Louisiana.

Mr. LEWIS. Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. PAYSON. In the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. LEWIS. Go ahead.

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman insists upon interrupting me I insist he shall be accurate.

Mr. LEWIS. Go ahead; I will not interrupt you.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman is only demonstrating and emphasizing that he does not know and is not familiar with the facts in his own case.

Mr. LEWIS. I will permit you to say anything you please.

Mr. PAYSON. I repeat, that action was in the Forty-fifth Congress. By reason of the crowded condition of the Calendar nothing was done with reference to it, but that was the action of the committee. In the Forty-sixth Congress a similar bill was introduced and favorably reported, and failed in the same manner. That answers the proposition of the gentleman from California. On that committee were Mr. ELLIS of this House, Mr. HARMER of Pennsylvania, and I think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] sitting on my right. All three were on the committee. I am authorized to say that committee unanimously made a report to the same purport and with the same result. That report was prepared by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], but no action was had.

Mr. CHALMERS. As I have been referred to, let me say that my recollection is that it was not unanimous.

Mr. PAYSON. I understood it was.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. WELLBORN and myself were in a minority. I will state further in reference to the Forty-fifth Congress, my recollection is that Mr. Elam asked leave to print a report, and it was referred back to the committee. I do not think it was ever acted upon.

Mr. PAYSON. I am told by members that that is the case; but whether unanimous or not, it was the action of the committee.

Now, in the Forty-seventh Congress a bill was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads there, which committee, as the record shows, reported unanimously against any interference with this railroad company, and the report is a part of the record of the Congressional proceedings of this Government.

That, Mr. Speaker, has been the history of Congressional action with reference to this grant; and so I come back to the proposition I at first advanced, that from the commencement of this contest down to the present time there has never been a report, there has never been any action, direct or indirect, on the part of either House of Congress, or of any committee of either House of Congress, adverse to the claim which the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company makes to this grant. So the question is presented here, whether or not under the circumstances of this case a forfeiture of this grant is either legal or equitable; and I insist, sir, and I will endeavor to demonstrate if my time permits and I can have the honor of the attention of the House that it is now giving me, that the grant is not forfeitable, either legally or equitably; and I will be glad if the gentlemen who are to follow me in support of this bill will follow the propositions which I shall assert here to show to the House by argument and by authority whether the positions I shall take are supported by the books or not.

This road was constructed by an assignee company, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, standing as the grantee of the first corporation, the Backbone company. It is not denied, in fact it is conceded, that a deed has been executed, and by the proper officers, which deed upon its face conveys the legal title to this grant to the claimant company.

Nobody pretends to deny it. It is admitted all through the case. But in the early history with reference to this grant it was insisted that the grant was not such a one as could be conveyed. It was argued by those who opposed the claims of this company that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company being the agent selected by the Government to build the road, it alone could perform the conditions of the grant and it alone would be entitled to the land, and that not until after it had performed the conditions and had built the road and within the time prescribed by the granting act. That was then strenuously insisted upon.

But the authorities are all the other way; that the language of this act being that there is hereby granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company every odd section of land for so many miles on either side of the road, to it, "its successors or assigns," that it vested that railroad company with present title to the land, and that being so vested it was the subject of alienation and conveyance. That doctrine insisted upon last year has been abandoned by the majority of the committee now, and they in their report concede that the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, by the deed which was made to it by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, took the legal title to the land as such, but coupled with the burden of the performance of the conditions. So there is no necessity for arguing that phase of the case.

That the grant is assignable we do not question, not because of the language "its successors and assigns" in the granting act, but because the right of disposition is inherent in ownership.

That being so—that the title to the grant could be legally assigned and conveyed—it follows that the New Orleans Pacific would stand in the shoes of the grantor, the Backbone company; it would take the grant with all the burdens, and subject to the same conditions; and it necessarily follows that unless the grant could be forfeited against the Backbone company had it done all that the New Orleans Pacific has done, it can not be forfeited as against the latter company. Let us see what the authorities are on this question.

By the conveyance the New Orleans Pacific was vested with the full right of the Backbone company, subject to the condition that it should build the road.

The law is well settled that any one interested in a condition may perform it.

The concession of the power to assign is conclusive against the right to forfeit as against the assignee, unless the grant could have been forfeited against the assignor, since this concession implies that the assignee may perform the condition, namely, build the road; and the law is clear that a substantial performance of the condition is all that is required.

Who may perform the condition? The law on this subject is well settled that any one interested in a condition may perform it.

It is a general rule that any one may perform a condition who has an interest in it or in the land whereto it is annexed. * * * This rule is recognized by the elementary writers. (People of Vermont vs. Society for Propagation of the Gospel, &c., 2 Paine, 545.)

Any one who is interested in a condition or the estate to which it is attached may perform it, and when it has once been performed it is thenceforth gone forever. (2 Washburn on Real Property, 2d ed., p. 10; 2 Crabbe on Real Property, 815; 10 Mod., 419; Cruise, title 19, Estates on Con., ch. 2, secs. 6, 20; Bac. Abr., title Condition (P) 1; Simonds vs. Simonds, 3 Met., Mass., 558.)

A substantial performance of the condition according to the meaning and intention of the parties is sufficient. (Wilson vs. Galt, 18 Ill., 431.)

It is sufficient if the substance of the condition be performed. (Comyn's Dig., Condition (G), 14).

If the condition be performed in substance it is sufficient. So if it be performed as near the intent of the condition as can be. (Comyn's Dig., Condition (L), 1).

Angell and Ames on Corporations, section 776, say:

A substantial performance of conditions, however, is all that is required, whether they be conditions precedent or subsequent.

So that it is clear that if the grant was legally conveyed there is no more power to forfeit this grant against the New Orleans Pacific than there would be against the Backbone Railroad Company.

What, then, is the next objection? And it will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, and to this I invite the attention of the House, that every argument made in favor of the forfeiture of this grant is based upon purely technical grounds, purely technical reasons, and those alone. To this I propose to address myself and take up the arguments in the order as they occur to me, whether or not the opposition is well grounded. The first is, and that point is strenuously insisted upon by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS], that under the charter which the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company had, and the amendments to it, it is required that the railroad which it should construct from New Orleans to Baton Rouge should be built on the east side of the Mississippi River. I agree that the charter does so provide, that the railroad it was authorized to build by the Louisiana Legislature from New Orleans to Baton Rouge should be built on that side of the river.

I concede the fact, too, that the railroad it did build is located on the west side of the Mississippi River from New Orleans to Baton Rouge. The answer to the objection made by the gentleman from Louisiana is this: This grant is made by an act of Congress, and Congress, when it made this grant, found in esse—in existence—a corporation capable of doing something created by the Legislature of Louisiana; and the act of Congress making this grant provides in express terms that the route upon which this road shall be built and in aid of which the grant is made shall be upon the route that the company deems the most eligible.

Mr. LEWIS. That is not my position.

Mr. PAYSON. Then what is it?

Mr. LEWIS. My position is that the road ought to be built in accordance with the act of the Legislature of Louisiana.

Mr. PAYSON. That is what I say as to your position. I supposed I was capable of speaking the English language with some degree of directness and that I would be understood in making an ordinary statement. But the gentleman bears me out in my statement. He insists that because the road was not built on the east side of the Mississippi River, therefore it had no power to build on the west side, because the charter provides that it might build a road on the east side.

Mr. LEWIS. No, that it must.

Mr. PAYSON. That it had no right to build it on the west side?

Mr. LEWIS. That is my position. I do hold that.

Mr. PAYSON. That is the gentleman's position, as I have repeatedly stated.

Now, I do not believe, since the decision of the Supreme Court in the "Granger cases"—bearing upon the power of Congress to deal with the question of interstate transportation, to confer upon corporations such powers and privileges as it might choose for purposes of carrying out and effectuating its purposes—I never supposed a lawyer would be found to stand up on the floor of this House and claim that Congress was restricted in any manner with reference to its dealings with any of these transcontinental lines.

I assert the law to be, and I will demonstrate it before I am through, that it makes no difference whatever as to the restrictions which the State Legislature made upon the local corporation. Congress could confer upon it the power to build a railroad wherever it chose. If the Legislature did not create a corporation, Congress has power enough in its arm to create the corporation itself and permit it to exercise the right of eminent domain in any State of this Union even against the opposition of a State Legislature. That is the settled law of this land to-day; and I doubt whether there is a lawyer who values his reputation that will stand on this floor and dispute that position.

A familiar illustration of it is found in the case of the Central Pacific Railroad. There was a corporation named in one of the greatest grants that were ever made by the Congress of the United States, the grant to the Union and Central Pacific Railroads. The Central Pacific Railroad Company was chartered and organized under an act of the Legislature of the State of California, and the only power that it had under its charter was to build a line of railroad from the city of Sacramento to the east line of the State of California. That was the only power it had; precisely a pat case with this.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentlemen permit me——

Mr. PAYSON. Not now.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not want you to misstate me.

Mr. PAYSON. I am not misstating the gentleman. I am talking about the Central Pacific Railroad, and I am asserting the doctrine, or trying to assert it, that it is perfectly and utterly immaterial, as between the Congress of the United States or the Government of this country and the different States of this Union, what power is conferred by a State Legislature. If Congress in its wisdom and for national objects, to effect national purposes, sees fit to clothe any local corporation with additional powers or impose upon it additional duties, it can do so, and nobody, not even a State, has any right to complain. I do not know that I can state it any plainer than that. In illustration of that proposition I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the Central Pacific Railroad Company, which was the beneficiary, to the extent that it constructed its road, of the great grant to the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, only had the power to build its road from Sacramento, in the State of California, to the east line of the State. What did Congress do? Congress wanted the line to extend to San Francisco. Finding the Central Pacific Company organized by the State of California and willing to perform the obligations sought to be imposed upon it, Congress exercised its power and said: "Build this road from the city of San Francisco east to the State line and we will make you this grant of land." And in the Sinking-fund cases, reported in 97 United States, the Supreme Court of the United States expressly decided the very question that I am presenting here, and say that as between Congress and the corporation it is utterly immaterial what powers it had granted to it by the State Legislature, but for whatever rights it claimed as between the Government and it, it must look to the national Legislature.

So, in this case. Here was a corporation of the State of Louisiana, authorized, I agree, to build its road only on the east side of the Mississippi River by its Legislature. But Congress comes in and says: "If you will build a railroad from New Orleans to Shreveport upon the most eligible route to be selected by you we will make you this grant of land." And this route was selected by the company and the railroad was built by its assignees between the points named in the granting act. I desire some of the gentlemen who will follow me to call attention to some authority which is in conflict with the proposition I have just advanced.

I will call attention to the familiar text-book of Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, where the distinguished author lays down precisely the same proposition and in about the same words that I have used here. I am quoting from that work from memory. So, Mr. Speaker, I take it that disposes of the objection, if it may rise to the dignity of an objection.

Another objection is made, Mr. Speaker, and it is regarded as one of the strong points in this case by gentlemen on the other side of it. They say that although this grant was conveyed in form by a deed fair upon its face, and if the antecedent steps had been regular would have conveyed the title, yet it is absolutely void for want of power. The question of ultra vires is raised as against the corporation which was the grantor in that deed, the Backbone company. My friend from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] labored long and earnestly to show that although the Backbone company was chartered by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, still before that deed was made the Legislature of Louisiana had repealed the charter and therefore it had no legal existence, so that it could not execute this conveyance, and therefore the New Orleans Pacific Company took nothing by that deed. I grant that they attempted to do what he says they did do. But I deny, Mr. Speaker, that the act of the Legislature of Louisiana was worth the paper upon which it is printed.

I ask the attention of the lawyers of this body just for a moment to this fact. Without stopping to read it I will ask permission to print it at length with my remarks. But I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana in front of me [Mr. LEWIS], if he does not understand my recital of this legislation precisely as I do, I will regard it as a personal favor if he will stop me anywhere to correct me.

Mr. LEWIS. It is rather late for repentance, I think. I wanted to interrupt the gentleman before and he would not let me do it.

Mr. PAYSON. In the charter which was passed by the Legislature of Louisiana incorporating the Backbone Railroad Company is found this language, substantially: "This charter shall be deemed and held to be between the State of Louisiana and the corporation hereby created, a contract which shall not be impaired, abrogated, or interfered with except upon petition by the corporation." That is almost verbatim a quotation from the charter of the Backbone Railroad Company. Anterior to that time, as a matter of prior legislation, there was a general act of the General Assembly——

Mr. LEWIS. It has always been in existence.

Mr. PAYSON. No; it has not always been in existence, for there was a time when the State of Louisiana itself did not exist. It was found among the session laws of Louisiana, and it is immaterial when it was passed so it was prior to this legislation. That general act provided in general terms that the Legislature should have power to abrogate the charters of private corporations, but only upon certain conditions, such as providing for the payment of the debts of the corporations and all that sort of thing. Subsequent to that general act this charter was passed, which was the latest expression of the legislative will and contained the clause which I have quoted.

In the repealing act, and without stopping to read it, for it is pretty voluminous—I will give the substance of it, giving to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] the same privilege that I gave him before of correcting me if I misstate—in the repealing act is only found the simple provision of repeal and nothing else. There is no pretense on the part of anybody who has ever been connected with this case either that there ever was a petition of this railroad company for the abrogation of its charter, or a compliance with the general law of Louisiana with reference to the repeal of charters generally. Nobody will ever pretend that; nobody has ever asserted it; and I say here confidently that from this time until the vote shall be taken on this bill nobody will stand up here and assert it.

That, it seems to me, settles the legal question. I appeal to lawyers within the sound of my voice, who are familiar with the decided cases from the Dartmouth College case down to this day, if the doctrine so elaborately asserted by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] yesterday would find a lodgment in the brain of any lawyer in this country. Nobody should assert it, and in the few minutes which I have spoken here it has been mentioned for the first time in this discussion.

Mr. LEWIS. My friend will not find in my speech of yesterday that I made anything more than a statement of the fact that the Legislature of Louisiana——

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, yes; the gentleman says he only stated the fact that the Legislature of Louisiana repealed the charter. I am endeavoring to demonstrate that the Legislature of Louisiana did not, because it could not repeal the charter by the action it took; that is what I said.

Mr. LEWIS. I claim that I have a right to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not yield.

Mr. LEWIS. You stated in the beginning of your remarks that you were willing to be interrupted for correction as to statement of facts.

Mr. PAYSON. I am willing to be interrupted when I misstate any facts.

Mr. LEWIS. I say you are not stating facts now. You agreed that I should be permitted to correct you if you made a misstatement, and I say you have made a misstatement.

Mr. PAYSON. I hope the gentleman will not get excited. I am trying to treat him more than fairly.

Mr. LEWIS. But you do not treat me with any courtesy at all.

Mr. PAYSON. I stated to the gentleman, and I repeat it now, that as to any statement of fact which I may make with reference to this legislation, or any statement of fact in connection with the relation of these two railroad companies to this land grant, I am willing and will be glad to be corrected. But I do not hold myself responsible for the misstatements, or rather the erroneous conclusions, of the gentleman from Louisiana, and do not agree that out of my time he may endeavor to set himself straight before the House as to the fallacies in which he indulged yesterday. As to any question of fact in relation to this grant, the attitude of Congress toward it, what the courts have decided, any question of fact in a broad sense, I am not only willing but will be glad and desirous to be interrupted; for all I want is to know what the facts are.

Mr. LEWIS. I state that the gentleman has misstated the position which I took yesterday.

Mr. PAYSON. I will yield to the gentleman out of my time three minutes to state what his position is in reference to this repeal, and to state how he now desires the House to understand him. Does the gentleman take it?

Mr. LEWIS. I did not hear you.

Mr. PAYSON. I beg the gentleman will give me his attention. I am vociferating at the top of my voice, and the gentleman does not give me his attention.

Mr. LEWIS. There is no doubt about your vociferating.

Mr. PAYSON. I say I will give the gentleman three minutes of my time to show the House what his position is in reference to the effect of the attempted repeal by the Legislature of Louisiana of the Backbone charter.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely stated that yesterday as one of the facts in this case, but made no argument upon it at all. I stated it simply as a fact in the history of this matter, and did not attempt to make any argument on that branch of the case at all.

Mr. PAYSON. Is that all the explanation the gentleman desires to make?

Mr. LEWIS. That is all I desire to state. I only want to correct your misstatement that I made any elaborate argument on that branch of the case.

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, I am willing to admit that the gentleman made no elaborate argument. Then if it is not asserted by the gentleman from Louisiana, if he does not now claim that the act of the Legislature of his State was effectual to any degree in repealing the privileges of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, I ask him now why he stated it at all as part of his argument?

Mr. LEWIS. Stated what?

Mr. PAYSON. Why, you stated as a fact that the charter had been repealed.

Mr. LEWIS. I did so for the simple reason that I wanted the House to be in possession of all the facts, whatever effect they might have. That is the reason I stated it.

Mr. PAYSON. I will call attention to the exact language of the charter and the alleged repeal, that there may be no room for dispute about it, as that seems to be regarded as specially important.

This is the provision of the Backbone charter:

An act to incorporate the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and to expedite the construction of their road.

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That the said company may accept the terms, conditions, and provisions of this act at any time within one year from the date of its passage and approval by a written acceptance, signed by a majority of the directors of the company, and addressed to the governor of the State of Louisiana; and in case of such acceptance by said company, said company shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act, and shall possess and enjoy the rights and franchises granted to said company by the State of Louisiana in this act and heretofore; and such grants and the engagements herein made and entered into on the part of the State of Louisiana shall be deemed to be and shall be binding contracts between the State of Louisiana and the said company, not to be impaired, disturbed, or modified by subsequent legislation, except with the consent and on the petition of said company.

Approved December 30, 1869. (Acts of Louisiana, 1870, pages 7 to 19.)

This the general law, passed prior to the charter. Article 447, Code of Louisiana, the general law, provides that—

A corporation legally established may be dissolved:

First. By an act of the Legislature, if they deem it necessary or convenient to the public interest; provided that when the act of incorporation imports a contract, on the faith of which individuals have advanced money or engaged their property, it can not be repealed without providing for the reimbursement of the advances made or making full indemnity to such individuals.

Second. By the forfeiture of their charter, when the corporation abuses its privileges or refuses to accomplish the conditions on which such privileges were granted, in which case the corporation becomes extinct by the effect of the violation of the conditions of the act of incorporation.

This the "repealing" act:

An act to repeal an act entitled "An act to incorporate the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and to expedite the construction of their road," No. 143, approved December 30, 1869; and also an act entitled "An act authorizing certain parishes, cities, and towns, by contributing to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, or by subscribing for its stock, or by purchasing its bonds, or by issuing the bonds and warrants of the said parishes, cities, and towns, to aid in the construction of the road of the said company or its branch or branches," No. 80, approved March 16, 1870; and also an act entitled "An act authorizing the parishes of Livingston, Saint Helena, East Feliciana, East Baton Rouge, and the city of Baton Rouge to aid in the construction of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad," No. 145, approved December 30, 1869.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and to expedite the construction of their road," No. 143, approved December 30, 1869; and also the act entitled "An act authorizing certain parishes, cities, and towns, by contributing to the New Orleans and Vicksburg Railroad Company, or by subscribing for its stock, or by purchasing its bonds, or by issuing the bonds and warrants of said parishes, cities, or towns, to aid in the construction of the road of said company or its branch or branches," No. 80, approved March 16, 1870; and also the act entitled "An act authorizing the parishes of Livingston, Saint Helena, East Feliciana, East Baton Rouge, and the city of Baton Rouge to aid in the construction of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad," No. 145, approved December 30, 1869, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, &c., That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all laws and parts of laws contrary to the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

(Acts of General Assembly of State of Louisiana, extra session, March 2, 1877.)

Now I come to another phase in this case. It is insisted by the gentlemen on the other side that time is of the essence of this contract——

Mr. HENLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me one moment, I understood there was a limitation of time in this debate?

Mr. PAYSON. I can not yield for any further arrangement.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman must yield for the rules of the House.

Mr. PAYSON. I hope the gentleman will not be so peremptory as to say that I "must yield." If he says that, I will not, though I am usually glad to extend any courtesy.

A MEMBER (to Mr. PAYSON). He says you must yield to the rules of the House.

Mr. HENLEY. I understood the time was to be divided equally between the opponents and the supporters of the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. I never understood there was any order of the House about the division of time. I tried to get such an order, but nobody would agree to it. Mr. Speaker, does this interruption come out of my time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). It does not. The gentleman is entitled to occupy the floor until his hour expires.

Mr. HENLEY. Three-fourths of the time thus far given to this debate has been consumed by gentlemen on one side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is no order of the House in regard to this debate. The gentleman from Illinois is on the floor in his own right, and is entitled under the rules to one hour.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, it was insisted on the other side, as another proposition, that time was of the essence of this contract; that in order for this company to claim this grant it was essential it should be shown that this road was constructed within the five years. No authority was cited in support of that proposition, nor can any be found. I make this statement without any affectation of learning. Commencing with the leading case upon this question, the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, in 21 Wallace, followed by an unbroken line of decisions of the Supreme Court and preceded by repeated and continued opinions by the Department of Justice, to be found in the sixteenth and seventeenth volumes of the Opinions of the Attorneys-General, the uniform course of opinion and decision has affirmed the doctrine which I will state in the language of the Supreme Court in the Schulenberg case, because it is better expressed than I could express it:

If the condition be not enforced—

That is, if the forfeiture be not declared for breach of condition—

the power over the land and the grant continues as well after as before the breach and is limited only by the object of the grant.

That is, the building of the road.

This doctrine, Mr. Speaker, has never been departed from by the Supreme Court in any case to which my attention has been called. Case after case has arisen where the application of that doctrine has been made, and this is the first instance either in Congress or the Departments where its application has been disputed where the road has been substantially completed before adverse legislation was begun.

I call attention to the opinion of the Attorney-General in two cases on the question as to "time being of the essence of the contract," and as to whether, after the expiration of the time, if Congress does not interfere to assert a forfeiture, the title to the lands is at all impaired by reason of the delay.

1. As to the effect of the proviso to the fourth section of the act of July 4, 1866:

While the part of the road to which your inquiries relate was not completed within the time limited by law, no attempt has been made to enforce any forfeiture of the lands granted to the State of Minnesota, or by any means, legislative or other, to revest the title in the United States. The question whether the State of Minnesota may still claim, under the act of Congress, lands which have been earned by the construction of the road since the expiration of the period, is determined by the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman (21 Wallace, 44). This was the case of a grant of lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a certain railroad within that State by an act of June 3, 1856. The language there used in reference to the condition upon which the grant might be defeated by non-completion of the road within ten years was as follows: "No further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States." The road had not been completed within the time required for its construction, which had not been extended; and Congress had passed no act nor taken any judicial proceeding to enforce any forfeiture of the grant for failure to construct the road within the period prescribed. Upon this state of facts it was held that a present interest was passed by the grant to the State of Wisconsin; that the proviso was in the nature of a condition subsequent; that the prohibition against further sales, if the road were not completed, added nothing to the force of the proviso, because a cessation of sales was necessarily implied in the condition that the lands should revert, but that if the condition were not enforced the power to sell continued as before its breach, limited only by the objects of the grant and the manner of sale prescribed by the act; and that as no action had been taken, either by legislation or judicial proceedings to enforce a forfeiture or revest the title in the United States, that title remained in the State as completely as it existed on the day that the title by location of the line of the railroad acquired precision and became attached to the adjoining alternate sections.

In direct answer to your inquiry upon this point I therefore reply that the Department is authorized by law to issue patents to the State of Minnesota for lands opposite that portion of the road constructed in sections of ten consecutive miles since February 26, 1877, the date at which, according to the fourth section of the act of July 4, 1866, it was provided, in the event that the road was not completed, that the lands not patented should revert to the United States, and this for the reason above stated, that no act, legislative or judicial, has been taken to revest the title of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, October 26, 1880.

SIR: Your letter of the 15th instant presents for my consideration the application of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company for the appointment of three commissioners to examine a section of twenty-five miles of its road west from Albuquerque, N. Mex., under section 4 of the act of Congress of July 27, 1866.

The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company was created by, and organized under, the act of Congress above mentioned, and was granted the right of way and the public lands of the United States, within certain defined limits, from Springfield, Mo., through the Indian Territory and New Mexico, to the Pacific coast.

Before 1871 it appears that the company constructed its road from Springfield to the western boundary line of the State of Missouri, and this portion of the road was duly accepted by the President, and patent for the land issued. This action was in accordance with the provision of section 4 of the granting act, which provides that when the company shall have twenty-five consecutive miles of any portion of said railroad ready for the service contemplated, the President of the United States shall appoint three commissioners to examine the same; and if it shall appear that twenty-five consecutive miles of road have been completed in all respects as required by the act the commissioners shall so report to the President of the United States, and patents to lands, as provided for by the third section of the act, shall be issued to the company.

The company next completed thirty-four miles in the Indian Territory prior to 1871; but because the United States had not extinguished the Indian title no steps were taken for the issuance of patents along the road in that Territory.

From the early part of the year 1871 down to August or September of the present year no section or portion of the road was constructed by the company; in fact no work of any kind or description was done by the company on the road.

Section 8 of the act makes it a condition of each and every grant, right, and privilege given to the company that the company "shall commence the work on said road within two years from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete not less than fifty miles per year after the second year; and shall construct, equip, furnish, and complete the main line of the whole road by July 4, 1878."

The company has not conformed to this condition, as it appears that for six years prior to July 4, 1878, no road was constructed; and, in addition, that for two years subsequent to that date no portion of the road was constructed.

The ninth section of the act recites that the conditional grants were made and accepted upon the further condition that "if the company make any breach of the conditions and allow the same to continue for upward of one year, then, in such case, at any time hereafter, the United States may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road."

By section 20 Congress has retained the right to add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act, having due regard for the rights of said railroad company.

Having in view the provisions and conditions of the granting act, and the failure on the part of the railroad company to perform the conditions prescribed in the manner recited, you request my opinion upon the following question:

"Is it within the power and the duty of the Executive to appoint commissioners to examine the section of road submitted by the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, to accept the same if completed in all respects required by the act of July 27, 1866, and to cause patents to be issued to said company for lands situated opposite to and conterminous with the section of road if completed?"

As I think the grant to this railroad must be treated as a present grant, to be made afterward definite, as from time to time the various portions of the road are completed, the only inquiry would seem to be whether or not the conditions upon which the company received the grant are in their nature conditions precedent or subsequent. If conditions precedent, the failure to perform such conditions would deprive the road of its right to make application for the benefits of the act if after such conditions were violated it proceeded to build portions of the road. If conditions subsequent, then it would be necessary for the United States to take advantage of such conditions by acting under the ninth section of the act, and proceeding itself to do acts and things which might be safe or necessary to insure a speedy completion of the road, or by declaring a forfeiture of the grant by legislative action, or by providing for enforcing the same by a judicial proceeding. If the United States were disposed to revest in itself or to enforce a forfeiture of the lands granted, it would be necessary to take some action indicative of that intention.

The case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman is apparently decisive of the present inquiry. That was the case of a grant of lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a certain railroad within that State by the act of June 3, 1856. The language of the first section of that act was, "that there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Wisconsin" the lands specified. Similar language is found in the third section of the act of July 27, 1866: "That there be, and hereby is, granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company," &c. In that case the grant was made upon a condition that if the road be not completed within ten years "no further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States." The road had not been completed within the time required for its construction, which had not been extended, and Congress had passed no act, nor provided for any judicial proceedings, to enforce any forfeiture of the grant for failure to construct the road within the period prescribed. Upon this state of facts it was held that the grants to the State of Wisconsin were grants in præsenti, which acquired precision as the right of the road became fixed by its location, and that the lands had not reverted to the United States, although the road was not constructed within the period prescribed, no action having been taken, either by legislation or judicial proceedings, to enforce a forfeiture of the grant. (21 Wall., 44.)

The conditions in the present case must be held, in view of this authority, to be conditions subsequent. Apparently they are much more strongly so in the case referred to. The section, 9, in which they are found distinctly contemplates that the United States will do some act, and may do certain acts upon the breach of the conditions.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the grant to the railroad has not been forfeited by its failure to build its road within the time named in the act, no action, by reason of its failure to perform the conditions, having been taken by authority of Congress. It having then a present grant, even if it be treated as one liable to forfeiture, it has still a right to proceed to construct the road, and until in some form advantage shall be taken of the breach of the conditions, it would be the duty of the executive department to give it the benefit of the grant.

I am also of opinion, therefore, that it would be within the power and duty of the Executive to appoint commissioners to examine the section of road submitted by the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, to accept the same if completed in all respects as required by the act of July 27, 1866, and to cause patents to be issued to said company for lands situated opposite to and conterminous with the section of road if completed.

I have the honor in this connection to refer to the opinion delivered to your Department by me of the date of November 29, 1879 (upon which I understand the Department has acted), in which the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, supra, was considered.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. DEVENS.

Hon. CARL SCHURZ,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Speaker, would the House believe this statement: that of the land-aided roads, aggregating over 12,000 miles in this country, roads aggregating more than 8,000 miles have been completed out of time? In Iowa, in Nebraska, in Kansas, in Michigan, in Minnesota, in Dakota, and all over the great Northwest the great majority of all the land-grant roads were completed out of time. Of the fourteen principal roads to which I shall call attention, this is the first road in regard to which it has ever been suggested that it should be interfered with on that account.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may as well refer to these cases now. The first is that of the North Wisconsin, formerly the Saint Croix and Lake Superior, and now the Chicago, Saint Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha. This is a road two hundred and twenty-six miles in length. The grant in aid of it was 1,408,000 acres, and not a spadeful of earth was turned on that road before the expiration of the time. It was all built out of time, the main line and branch.

This is the road out of the grant to which arose the Schulenberg case, and it was built thirteen years out of time, and built by an assignee company, precisely as in the case being considered.

In none of these cases has it been proposed to interfere. Why? Because, as I shall show, the authorities are to the point that if there has been substantial performance by anybody who was interested in it and before the grantor chose to take advantage of the breach, the right is gone. I will call attention to the authorities in support of it.

Mr. HENLEY. The House desires information.

Mr. PAYSON. Ask me a question; I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. HENLEY. I understand the gentleman to say the authorities are numerous that in a Government grant, where the condition subsequent is performed after the time prescribed, the grant is then yielded and is not forfeitable. Cite one single authority to the country.

Mr. PAYSON. I have not cited one authority as to a Government grant. I am speaking on the subject of grants generally.

Mr. HENLEY. Then what is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. PAYSON. I am talking about the law in reference to a grant, and I will call the gentleman's attention to it if he will not interrupt me.

Mr. HENLEY. Oh, that is becoming too monotonous.

Mr. PAYSON. It is a monotony the gentleman will have the opportunity to indulge in when he follows me by referring us to a few books where a different doctrine is laid down.

Mr. HENLEY. I will, if you ever get through your speech.

Mr. PAYSON. I say the authorities are all to the point where there was a condition subsequent and that condition was performed in substance by the grantee or anybody entitled to perform the condition, and before the grantor has taken steps to take advantage of the breach of condition, then the condition is waived. The law is precisely the same as to the Government in reference to any of these transactions as it is between individuals, except the single difference that negligence is never imputable to the Government, and that is the only exception to the rule.

Mr. OATES. Here is a case of a legislative grant.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] calls my attention to this case, The People of Vermont vs. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, &c., 2 Paine, 563. It is a legislative public grant on condition, and one question was the effect of a performance. After citing Marks vs. Marks, 10 Mod., 419, the court say:

When the condition is once performed it is thenceforth entirely gone, and the thing to which it was before annexed becomes absolute and wholly unconditional.

And I call attention to Washburn on Real Property, volume 2, page 10, where it is said, in speaking of estates on condition and of the rights of the grantor in case of breach of the condition:

Notwithstanding the breach, the estate, if a freehold, can only be defeated by an entry made, and until that is done it loses none of its original qualities or incidents.

And any one who is interested in the condition or the estate to which it is attached may perform it, and when it has once been performed it is thenceforth gone forever.

I will not take the time of the House by reading the list of authorities I have here before me to the same purport. Nearly all of them have been cited by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], and it is unnecessary to repeat the reading; but the House will remember that all the cases, without any exception, yet considered by the committee or the House have been where nothing whatever has been done, or where there has been only part performance.

Here the road, as constructed, was completed and accepted, and the condition substantially performed before this bill was introduced into the House.

The next case I will call attention to is the Saint Vincent Extension of the Saint Paul and Pacific Two-thirds of that road was completed after the time and the last of it eleven years after the time had expired as to the grant.

The Brainerd Branch of the Saint Paul and Pacific, a grant of 243,712 acres. There not a spadeful of work was put in time by the people who took the grant, and no one ever pretends or insists that was forfeitable.

Then comes the Hastings and Dakota, 1,293,400 acres. One hundred and twenty-eight miles of the road was built after the time, some seven years after the time, and only forty-seven miles was built within the time. The grant went, and nobody pretends or ever did pretend the Government could interfere.

Then comes the West Wisconsin. There was a road that was built fifteen years after the time. It should have been completed June 5, 1866. It was completed fifteen years out of time. The grant was 1,305,600 acres.

I next call attention to the Wisconsin Central. A part of the main line was built out of time, and a part of the road from Ashland to Superior City has not only never been built, but has been abandoned, as gentlemen from that part of the country well know. That part of the Wisconsin Central road from Ashland to Superior City has never been built, and a large portion of the road was built out of time. No one pretends there is any right to interfere with that grant of 1,800,000 acres.

Then comes the Jackson, Lansing and Saginaw road, in Michigan. Twenty miles of that road is built from Janesville to Amboy. It was a branch line. The main line is built, and that is regarded as a substantial compliance with the conditions of the grant.

Then comes the Southern Minnesota Railroad Extension. Of that road one hundred and forty-nine miles was built within the time, only a small proportion of it within the time contemplated by the law, and that also was regarded as a substantial performance. The grant was made to the Southern Minnesota Railroad Company, which company was succeeded by another, the Southern Minnesota Railroad Extension Company. This company, as the assignee of the original grant, went on and completed the construction out of time, and that is not to be interfered with. The Lake Superior and Mississippi is another. The Little Rock and Fort Smith is another. And if the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] is present I desire to call his attention to a matter in connection with that road which took place in the last Congress. It was, or a portion of it rather, substantially built within the time required. It was not entirely built. A bill was introduced declaring the land forfeited because of non-compliance.

The question came before the Committee on the Judiciary of the last Congress, of which I was a member, and it was shown by the certificate from the governor of that State that the road was then entirely completed. The Committee on the Judiciary unanimously reported, at the request of the gentleman from Arkansas, a bill to the effect that the grant ought not to be interfered with, and the patent issued, and it was done.

There is another case, a late case, in the district represented by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE], the Sioux City and Saint Paul road. There is a bill which has been reported to this House from the Committee on the Public Lands. The grant made in that case was for the construction of a road from the Minnesota State line to Sioux City or Le Mars. They commenced the construction of the road at the Minnesota State line and built toward Sioux City. When they got within some twenty-six miles of Sioux City they made connection with another road which was constructing from the opposite direction but had built its line down toward Sioux City, this road being built by the McGregor Western, I believe. They made a junction with this road at Le Mars, considering that there was no necessity for the construction of both roads. The Committee on the Public Lands reported a bill, which passed Congress within the last four days by unanimous consent, giving that company the lands which lie conterminous with the constructed portion of the road, simply declaring a forfeiture of the unearned part. This was within the last four days.

Mr. COBB. I think my friend from Iowa should do the Committee on Public Lands the justice to say that by the act this land can not be forfeited.

Mr. PAYSON. But there is another road, Mr. Speaker, the Saint Paul and Sioux City. There is a little branch from Saint Paul to Shakopee Falls which was never constructed. Part, I think, of the balance of the road was built within the time, but this was never constructed, although it has been held to be a substantial compliance.

Now, I have given a list of thirteen of the roads standing upon analogous if not absolutely pat grounds with the case considered here. And I state what I believe to be true, and never has been disputed, that there has not been a suggestion at any time that Congress should or could declare the forfeiture of any of them.

The question was asked by the gentleman from Louisiana, "Why not give the Government the benefit of the doubt, as in the case of the Oregon Central, passed the other day?" and looked at me as if addressing the inquiry to me; and I assume that he expected an answer. I shall give it to him with pleasure. The difference is simply this: In the case of the Oregon Central grant, as every member of this House present will remember, there had been only twenty-five miles of the main line and twenty-seven and one-half miles of the branch road built, and the ninety-seven miles of the main line, which was the essential factor in the case, had been absolutely abandoned by the company claiming the benefit of the grant. Here, in the case at bar, the railroad company have performed the conditions before adverse legislation is attempted, and are only claiming the lands which are conterminous with the constructed portion of the road.

One feature of the case may be touched upon by gentlemen upon the other side when they come to close this debate. It is that sixty-eight miles of this road from New Orleans northwardly from Baton Rouge were not built by this company at all. I presume that will be adverted to, because it is a point that is noticed by the committee. It is true that, as a matter of fact, when this company commenced the construction of this road to Baton Rouge and Shreveport they purchased from the old Morgan Steamship and Railway Company sixty-eight miles of constructed road, which they utilized as a part of their road. But they claim no land on account of that. The application to the Interior Department is for lands conterminous with the roads they constructed.

Now, another thing. It was stated by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] that the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company did not build this road, and he asserts it was built by the Texas Pacific under the lead of Mr. Jay Gould. I have nothing in sympathy with Mr. Gould. I do not know him personally, although I have heard something of him through the newspapers. But I speak of what appears in the records of the Public Lands Committee, in documents there which have never been disputed, when I say that at the time the contract for this road was made Mr. Gould had not a dollar of interest in the Texas Pacific Company. It was then under the presidency and control of Mr. Thomas Scott, a name somewhat familiar to every one who is interested in railroad matters. But, then, what difference does that make?

Another point was made by the gentleman from Louisiana, that the road was not constructed by the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. I hold in my hand and will ask to have it printed with my remarks the sworn statement of General Dodge, of Iowa, who was connected with the construction company which did build the road, and the sworn testimony of Mr. Wheelock, who was at that time the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. In those affidavits, which have been matters of record in the Public Lands Committee since last January, they make the sworn statement that this railroad was built by the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company upon the faith of this grant and upon the positive and direct assurance first of the Backbone Railroad Company that the grant should be obtained, and then later on, in the fall of 1880 and the early winter of 1881, on a direct affirmance on the part of the Interior Department that the grant was assignable and that the New Orleans Pacific would be entitled to it if it secured the grant and built the road.

The papers made by the gentlemen named are these:

Sworn statement of Grenville M. Dodge in regard to the construction of the New Orleans Pacific Railway (submitted to House Public Lands Committee).

HOW THE ROAD WAS BUILT.

I, Grenville M. Dodge, state that in the winter of 1879 or spring of 1880 Mr. E. B. Wheelock, president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, came on his own motion, and without any suggestion from me, to see me and other gentlemen with whom I was associated in business relations to enlist us in the enterprise of building the road of the said company from New Orleans to Shreveport, showing us the charter, constitution, and laws of Louisiana, and representing very strongly how earnestly the people of New Orleans and Louisiana wanted this road constructed, so as to give New Orleans a connection with the Texas and Pacific Company. I had repeated interviews with Mr. Wheelock on the subject, and in April and May, 1880, I caused an examination of the route and cost of the proposed road to be made by engineers and others. I was informed and knew of the existence of the Backbone land grant.

ASSIGNMENT OF LAND GRANT A SINE QUA NON.

The result of numerous interviews was that I told him, as representing myself and others, that we would not undertake the construction of this road unless it could get the benefit of the land grant which had been made to the Backbone company, either by a transfer of the same by Congress or by the Backbone company. He assured myself and associates that in one of these ways this could be effected, and to confirm his assurance he showed us a written statement, signed, as I recollect, by the Louisiana delegation, that they were in favor of, and would do everything in their power to secure this grant, to aid in the construction of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad, which statement had a very material, if not controlling, influence in inducing us to undertake and carry on this work. I here positively state that unless this land grant could have been assured to the New Orleans Pacific we would not have enlisted in the enterprise of building the road. As the route of this road was practically identical with the route of the Backbone Company, it is clear that as a business matter capital could not be enlisted in it as against another company having the advantages of a land grant. We said to Mr. Wheelock that the transfer of the land grant from the Backbone company to the New Orleans Pacific Company would answer, provided the other terms could be satisfactorily agreed upon; and provided further, our counsel would advise us that an assignment by the Backbone company would be effectual. Negotiations were carried on through the spring and perhaps early summer of 1880, which finally resulted in an undertaking by the representatives by the Backbone company to transfer the land grant to the New Orleans Pacific, which agreement was afterward carried out by the resolution of the Backbone company dated December 29, 1880, subsequently ratified by the stockholders of that company and by the deed of that company of date January 5, 1881.

THE CONSIDERATION FOR BUILDING.

The land grant constituted part of the consideration for the building of the New Orleans Pacific road, and the enterprise was undertaken by myself and others, organized into the American Railway Improvement Company, on the faith of getting the benefit of the land grant, and the enterprise was prosecuted on the faith and belief that the assignment was effectual, and with the repeated recognition thereof by the officers of the Government during the progress of the work, such as the letters of General James A. Williamson, Commissioner of the Land Office, of February 17, 1881, and February 21, 1881; by Secretary Kirkwood in 1881; by the appointment of a commissioner to examine the road; and the opinion of the Attorney-General of June 13, 1882. The road was completed in 1882, with the exception of a bridge across the Atchafalaya River, which is a very expensive structure, costing about $400,000, which was completed about Christmas, 1883. On March 13, 1883, the Secretary of the Interior recommended the issue of patents to the New Orleans Pacific company for the lands earned by it for the construction of the said road, and his recommendation was approved by the President; on the faith of which large sums of money have been expended in the construction of the said bridge; and on faith of which also, and of the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of October 15, 1883, large sums of money have been paid for the cost of selecting lands to which the company was entitled, amounting, as near as I can recollect, to about $30,000.

THE COMPANY'S LIBERAL POLICY AND DEALINGS.

To avoid all doubtful questions, and display a spirit of fairness and liberality, I assented on behalf of my company to relinquish our right to the lands in respect of sixty-eight miles of road which, instead of building, the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company purchased and acquired from another company, notwithstanding I was advised by counsel that the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was just as much entitled to the land grant for these sixty-eight miles of road, purchased under lawful authority from another company, and thus made part of its line, as if the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company had originally built it itself.

In pursuance of this same spirit and policy the improvement company assented that the railroad company might accept the adjustment proposed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his letter of May 22, 1883, fixing the date of definite location as of October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882, although the said line was definitely located long prior to those dates; and in pursuance of the same spirit and policy the said improvement company assented to the Robinson-Blanchard contract of January 4, 1882, whereby it was agreed that settlers and occupiers of the lands up to that date should have the right to purchase the same, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres each, at a price not exceeding $2 per acre.

Under these circumstances to forfeit this land grant, even if the bare legal power to forfeit it exists, I hope I will be pardoned to say, since such is the opinion and sentiment of those who furnished the means whereby to build and equip this road and to effect and consummate the public object of Congress in making the grant, without which New Orleans and Louisiana would to-day remain without direct connection with the Texas and Pacific, is so monstrously unjust, that it is difficult to conceive it as even possible.

SMALL PROFITS IN CONSTRUCTION.

In building this road, on account of the extraordinary high waters for two years and the increased cost of bridging the Atchafalaya River and the large and expensive terminals in New Orleans, there has been no profit to the improvement company. The actual cash paid out for the construction of the road is more to-day than the value of the securities received for the construction thereof; and if this land grant is obtained with the quantity thus diminished, as above stated, it will afford, at most, to the builders of this road a very moderate, almost insignificant, profit.

G. M. DODGE.

Sworn to February 18, 1884.

W. W. COTTON, Notary Public.

In the matter of the land grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.—Statement of E. B. Wheelock, president New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, the assignee of above land grant.

To the honorable members of the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress:

GENTLEMEN: As president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, the assignee of the lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by act of Congress of March 3, 1871, it is my purpose to lay before you a brief summary of the facts and incidents connected with the assignment and pertinent to the question now under consideration by your honorable body, to wit, the forfeiture of the said grant.

The New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was chartered under the general law of Louisiana on June 29, 1875, and work was begun during the ensuing autumn. On the 19th of February, 1876, the General Assembly of Louisiana passed an act confirming the notarial charter and granting its perpetual existence. The long-felt need of railway communications in my State, and the urgent necessity for them then existing, and plainly visible on every side in the decline in value of all the immovable property of every description, both in the country parishes and in the chief city of Louisiana (New Orleans), had aroused the people throughout the State to a sense of the imperative need of a line of railway which would connect them with the great and prosperous section west of the Mississippi River. No public enterprise ever undertaken was more in harmony with popular feeling and popular sympathy than the proposed construction of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

After the lapse of a little more than a year about $750,000 in cash had been subscribed, and a portion of it had been expended. In the winter of 1877 the railway company made vigorous efforts in Washington to procure the forfeiture of the land grant to the New Orleans Pacific, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, with the view of obtaining the same for themselves. These efforts were continued until 1880 without success, and the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company found themselves at that period with their funds exhausted and a portion only of the road-bed constructed. Such was the embarrassed condition of the finances of the people of Louisiana that the company was left helpless and unable to prosecute the work. At this juncture, the parties who were constructing the Texas and Pacific Railroad entered into writings to extend that line and construct the New Orleans Pacific Railway to New Orleans, provided the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company was secured to them. I at once took steps to secure the transfer of the land grant, and succeeded. Contracts for the construction of the road were then immediately signed, and it was rapidly pushed forward, and was completed in 1882. Upon its completion the Government of the United States accepted the road and issued orders for the issue of patents upon the land, and the local land officers officially notified that the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company could make their selections, and on the payment of fees the title thereto would be vested in the company, so that the lands have been fully earned and the title or right of the company thereto is perfect. Only the formal act of the issue of the patents remains to be done.

As an immediate consequence of the construction of the road, the values of property in New Orleans and in the country parishes on the line of the road were largely enhanced, railroad enterprises were stimulated and increased, thereby greatly enlarging the assessments of taxable property and offering increased facilities to agriculture and commerce.

On the accession of Hon. N. C. BLANCHARD to a seat in the House of Representatives from the fourth Louisiana district, in the year 1881, a doubt appeared in his mind as to the possibility of the railroad company not properly regarding the right of the settlers and occupiers of the land embraced in the grant, and jointly with Hon. E. W. Robertson, member of Congress from sixth Louisiana district, he filed a letter with the honorable Secretary of the Interior asking for delay in the issuance of patents to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company. On being apprised of this, I at once proceeded to Washington and entered into a written agreement for the protection of the settlers and occupiers; and thereupon, on the 4th of January, 1882, Messrs. Robertson and BLANCHARD addressed a letter to the honorable Secretary of the Interior withdrawing their objections. Throughout this interval various protests and objections to the issuance of the patents have been presented to the honorable Secretary of the Interior. Some of these, attaining prominence through the agency of the press, were afterward proved to have emanated from black-mailing sources, not before, however, leaving their impress in certain quarters where one might have expected that good judgment and able statesmanship would have resisted the cry of "anything to beat a railroad corporation." Happily such sentiments do not find a lodgment in the clear intelligence and strong sense of justice which control the deliberations and conclusions of this honorable body.

The right to the lands claimed by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company under the transfer of this grant has been acquiesced in by the Senate Commitee on Railroads (Senate Report No. 711, Forty-seventh Congress, first session); by both the late and the present Commissioner of the General Land Office; by the Secretary of the Interior; by the Attorney-General; and finally by the President of the United States.

More than two years after the completion of the road a protest against the issuance of the patents to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was filed by Hon. E. T. LEWIS, member of Congress from sixth Louisiana district, in which he stands alone of the delegation from his State. By reference to a map to be found in the General Land Office it will be seen that about one-twentieth of the lands included in this grant and belonging to the railway lies in his district, while nineteen-twentieths of the land is embraced in the district represented by Hon. N. C. BLANCHARD, member of Congress.

By reference to the Census Compendium of 1880 and the extra census bulletin (areas of the United States) it can be proved that unless more than 10 per cent. of the constituency represented by Hon. Mr. LEWIS are settlers without title upon the lands in question, the number of people in his district who are interested in this matter does not exceed sixty, and these are amply protected by the agreement made between the railway company and Mr. BLANCHARD, and the predecessor of Mr. LEWIS, Mr. Robertson.

Under the act granting these lands there could be no valid settlement or pre-emption after the maps of location were filed. These were filed by the grantee company in 1871 and 1873, and the lands withdrawn from sale or pre-emption. At all events there could be no valid settlement or pre-emption after the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company actually built its road. Now the Robertson-Blanchard agreement agrees to protect all settlers down to the date of that agreement, January 4, 1882, and allows them to buy their lands at $2 per acre, one-third cash on the issue of patents and balance in one and two years, at 6 per cent. interest. This is less than Government price for the alternate sections, and on easier terms.

If Congress should undertake to forfeit this grant this would end this agreement, and years of litigation would ensue, in which no one would know meantime who owned the lands. A greater misfortune to the settlers and curse and blight to this whole region, now rapidly developing, could not be inflicted than to pass an act of Congress (which would certainly prove abortive in the courts) undertaking to forfeit the grant.

An act of greater injustice to the men who furnished the money to build this road on the faith of this grant, and without which the road would not have been built to-day, was never proposed to a legislative body.

It can not be possible, in view of this plain statement of facts, that a sufficient number of Representatives in Congress can be found to sustain this attack upon the legal and equitable rights of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, and to demand a forfeiture, which in this instance is but another name for a violation of the obligation of a contract.

It is a form of repudiation which I will not believe that any considerable portion of an American Congress will lend themselves to.

Respectfully submitted.

E. B. WHEELOCK,
President New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

The point that I make, Mr. Speaker, is that if the statements made by the gentleman from Louisiana, which he says he believes to be true, but which are in conflict with these sworn affidavits which have been in our committee-room since last January—if his belief is well founded, it seems to me very strange there has not been some proof obtained in the matter. This case is not one which has quietly gone through the committee and been reported pro forma. It has been contested by friends and opponents of the bill. From its very inception down there has never been to my knowledge an asserted statement of facts susceptible of proof and capable of proof that has not been disputed, and as to which proof has not been adduced. And therefore I ask that when two gentlemen who are reputed to be respectable men, who had positive knowledge with reference to it, come before the committee, although they happen to be connected with a railroad corporation, and make a sworn statement of fact, and nobody denies it or disputes their statement, it is simply a matter of conviction on the part of the gentleman from Louisiana, without a statement to the House as to the fact on which he bases that conviction, that these affidavits should go for what they are worth.

Now that the Interior Department did give this railroad company the assurance that if the railroad was built they would have the grant confirmed——

Mr. LEWIS rose.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. LEWIS. I do dispute the fact that the Interior Department ever gave sanction to this grant until March 3, 1883.

Mr. PAYSON. The Interior Department gave that assurance so far as the Commissioner of the General Land Office could do it. The gentleman stultifies himself when he says it did not.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not stultify myself.

Mr. PAYSON. If the expression is not parliamentary I withdraw it. I have here letters, three in number, from the Department of the Interior, addressed to the managers of the railway company before they had commenced substantial performance of the work—before they commenced the work, showing that they relied on this grant, they addressed a letter to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to know whether they would have the benefit of this grant, if the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company would convey it to them. The Commissioner of the General Land Office officially notified the company it was subject to transfer, and if they secured it and built the road they would be entitled to the benefit of the grant. I will ask leave to print this with my remarks. If any gentleman desires it I will ask the Clerk to read it.

Mr. LEWIS. You have not time left for that.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I will insert them.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1881.

SIR: In compliance with the verbal request of Hon. J. H. KETCHAM, I make the following statement:

By the twenty-second section of an act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company," &c., approved March 3, 1871, a grant of land was made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of its road.

At a special meeting of the directors of said New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, held December 29, 1880, a resolution was adopted authorizing the president and secretary of the company to transfer all the right, title, and interest of said company in and to said grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, and to make and execute such instruments as should be necessary for that purpose.

On the 5th day of January, 1881, the president and secretary, pursuant to said authority, executed a deed in the name of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, conveying all the right, title, and interest of said company in and to said grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

On the 3d day of February, 1881, the directors of the last-named company adopted a resolution authorizing the president of the company to accept said conveyance, and to execute any documents necessary to evidence the acceptance.

There can be no doubt that when the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company accepts said transfer the company will be fully vested with all the right, title, and interest which the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company has in and to said grant.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WILLIAMSON, Commissioner.

W. H. BARNUM, Esq.,
President of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

Letter of acceptance, in same terms, to be filed in your office, will follow in due course of mail.

Please advise me if this action completes the assignment and transfer of this land grant, and oblige,

Hon. W. H. BARNUM,
President N. O., B. R. and V. R. R. Co., 52 William st., N. Y.

THE NEW ORLEANS, BATON ROUGE AND VICKSBURG RAILWAY COMPANY, By WM. M. BARNUM, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1881.

SIR: On the 17th instant you filed with me certain papers, showing the transfer by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, of the land grant to the former company. You verbally asked me for an expression of opinion as to the effect and sufficiency of the transfer.

On the same day (17th instant) I addressed a letter to Hon. W. H. Barnum, president of the first-named company, expressing the opinion that the transfer would fully vest in the last-named company, upon a formal acceptance thereof by it, all the right, title, and interest of the first named.

On the 21st instant you filed a letter from Mr. Barnum, dated 19th instant, addressed to me, covering a telegram from E. B. Wheelock, president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, dated New Orleans, 19th instant, being the required acceptance of the transfer.

By letter to Mr. Barnum, dated 21st instant, I acknowledged receipt of his letter and inclosure, and stated that the transfer was not complete.

On the 24th instant you referred a letter dated New York, 23d instant, addressed to you from William M. Barnum, secretary of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, covering the original of the telegram of acceptance, above referred to.

Yesterday you telegraphed me, asking if the papers last described had been received; to which I at once responded by telegraph in the affirmative.

All the papers in the case have been filed.

Very respectfully, &c.,

J. A. WILLIAMSON, Commissioner

Hon. J. H. KETCHAM,
House of Representatives.

It is said the proceedings making the transfer were fraudulent as to the stockholders of the Backbone company.

Although this case has been continuously and notoriously before the proper committee of the House, both in the last Congress and in this, I have yet to see or hear of a single person who now makes complaint, by himself or by his attorney, who was interested either as stockholder, bondholder, creditor, or officer of the Backbone company. A list of the stockholders of that company has been filed in the Interior Department for several years, and none of them have complained to my knowledge. No such complaint has come to my notice or hearing. The papers, records, deeds, proxies, &c., are all regular and fair on their face; and in the absence of any complaint on the part of any person interested, and who would complain if injured, I feel bound to assume that the papers are good for what they purport.

The question of the action of officers of the company is one for the courts. If any shareholder has been injured the courts will afford him a remedy. Here the deed of the Backbone company was, in fact, made, and the grantee accepted it, and no one interested is making any compliant.

Another point I wish especial attention to and not yet presented here: That there has been full performance has been found and determined by the proper officers, as provided by law. The railroad has been inspected and accepted by the executive branch of the Government, and the acceptance is conclusive unless set aside by the courts for fraud. The statute provides for the inspection and acceptance of the road. (Section 18.) It has been done. (Hassard, No. 18, 53; Executive Document 31.) This is the law: An administrative officer charged with the duty of determining a fact, and applying the law thereto, acts in a quasi-judicial capacity, and his decision is valid and binding.

In Murray's Lessee et al. vs. Hoboken Land and Improvement Company (18 How., 280) it was held:

That the auditing of the accounts of a receiver of public moneys may be, in an enlarged sense, a judicial act, must be admitted. So are all these administrative duties, the performance of which involves an inquiry into the existence of facts and the application to them of rules of law.

Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 69:

Great deference hasbeen paid in all cases to the action of the executive department, where its officers have been called upon, under the responsibility of their official oaths, to inaugurate a new system, and when it is to be presumed they have carefully and conscientiously weighed all considerations and endeavored to keep within the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. If the question involved is really one of doubt, the force of their judgment, especially in view of the injurious consequences that may result from disregarding it, is fairly entitled to turn the scale in the judicial mind.

See Lytle vs. State of Arkansas, 9 Howard, 333: A register and receiver being made by the act a tribunal to ascertain questions of fact as to pre-emption, their decision can not be impeached except for fraud.

United States vs. Arredondo (6 Peters, 691):

It is a universal principle that where power or jurisdiction is delegated to any officer or tribunal over a subject-matter, and its exercise is confided to his or their discretion, the acts so done are binding and valid as to the subject-matter, and individual rights will not be disturbed collaterally for anything done in the exercise of that discretion within the authority and power conferred. The only questions which can arise between an individual claiming a right under the acts done and the public, or any person denying its validity, are power in the officer and fraud in the party. All other questions are settled by the decision made or the act done by the tribunal or officer, whether executive, legislative, judicial, or special, unless an appeal is provided for, or other revision by some appellate or supervisory tribunal is prescribed by law.

In the case of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company (7 Otto, 496) the Supreme Court holds that the approval by the President of the report of the commissioners appointed to examine the road vests the title to the land, and that the land is beyond the control of the Government or any of the Departments; that so far as the Government is concerned the transaction is closed.

The Court of Claims has held in the Chorpenning case (3 Court of Claims, 147) that—

If, on the contrary, the Postmaster-General acted or was to act in a judicial or quasi-judicial character, either as arbitrator or as a special tribunal invested with the sole jurisdiction of the claim, then his award was final and conclusive, and its errors can not be corrected by an action in any other tribunal.

United States vs. Burlington and Missouri River Railroad (98 United States, 341), on the question of Department construction of statutes even:

Such has been the uniform construction given to the acts by all Departments of the Government. Patents have been issued, bonds given, mortgages executed, and legislation had upon this construction. This uniform action is as potential and as conclusive of the soundness of the construction as if it had been declared by judicial decision. It can not at this day be called in question.

Ex parte Randolph, 2 Brock., 473:

I take it to be a sound principle that where a special tribunal is created, with limited power and a particular jurisdiction, whensoever the power is once executed, the jurisdiction is exhausted and at an end; that the person thus invested with power is, in the larger usage of the law, functus officio.

This doctrine has been repeatedly expounded by consecutive Attorneys-General: Attorney-General Wirt (2 Op., 9); Attorney-General Taney (2 Op., 462); Attorney-General Nelson (4 Op., 341); Attorney-General Toucey (5 Op., 29); Attorney-General Johnson (5 Op., 122); Attorney-General Crittenden (5 Op., 284); Attorney-General Black (9 Op., 32,101, 301); Attorney-General Stanbery (12 Op., 355); Attorney-General Hoar (13 Op., 33, 226); Attorney-General Akerman (13 Op., 387); Attorney-General Bristow (13 Op., 457); Attorney-General Devens (15 Op., 208, 316).

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has expired.

Mr. PAYSON. I have had a good deal of my time taken up by interruptions.

Mr. COBB. I have tried to have a fair division of the time. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] who has charge of the bill gave notice that he would call the previous question at 4 o'clock.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] who now has the floor, or is about to yield it, asked me how the time would be divided, and I told him that it would be divided equally. The gentleman has now consumed very nearly all the time on that side, and it does seem to me that it would be well for the previous question to be now called.

Mr. VAN EATON. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON] has ten minutes of his time remaining and yields it to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. As I was saying, the record in this case, all the testimony in connection with it, which to my knowledge has never been disputed, shows that this railroad was built upon the faith and strength of this grant. That the Government of the United States made a covenant with this company by the twenty-second section of the Texas Pacific act that if this road was built by them they should have this grant is not disputed. That the road has substantially been built is conceded.

There is some technical objection as to that portion of the road between Marshall and Shreveport, but outside of that, and waiving the legal point that they had no right to build on the west side of the Mississippi River, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] will not deny that from New Orleans by the way of Baton Rouge to Shreveport, and connecting thence with the Texas Pacific system running west to El Paso and thence to the Pacific Ocean, a line of railroad has been constructed and is now in successful operation. That will not be disputed. The gentleman assents to it.

Now, what has been the affirmative action of every official upon this grant? Every department of this Government, from the making of this grant down to this day, commencing first at the White House, the President of the United States saying formally and placing his signature and seal upon a document now in the Interior Department, a printed copy of which I hold in my hand, that this railway company is entitled to the benefit of this grant; the Secretary of the Interior, Secretary Teller, a man who is known this country over as a man who does not swerve in the least in the interest of corporations, stating in an official report to the President of the United States that this railroad company is entitled to the benefits of this grant——

Mr. LEWIS. He says he resisted it.

Mr. PAYSON. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me; if he will not state the facts——

Mr. LEWIS. I can state facts just as well as you can, and I do not like this insinuation; I want you to understand that. [The Speaker pro tempore rapped with his gavel.] I do not like this insinuation. I can state facts as well as you can. I will not permit these insinuations from any man on this floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (rapping). The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] is not in order.

Mr. PAYSON. What is the matter with the gentleman?

Mr. LEWIS. I will let you know what is the matter with me very quick. I do not like any such insinuations that I can not state facts as well as you can.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana is not in order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] declines to yield.

Mr. PAYSON. I hope there will not be anybody injured; I hope not. I ask the Clerk to read——

Mr. LEWIS. I do not like any unjust insinuations upon my ability to state facts as well as the gentleman can.

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, nobody insinuated that.

Mr. LEWIS. If you do not mean that, say so.

Mr. PAYSON. Nobody has insinuated a word against you.

Mr. LEWIS. Very well; that is all right.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask the Clerk to read a paragraph from the official letter of Secretary Teller to the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

I have also the honor to submit herewith two reports on the New Orleans Pacific Railway by Mr. Thomas Hassard, whom you appointed commissioner to examine completed portions of said railway.

The first report bears date 26th of October, 1881, and has not been submitted to you at an earlier date on account of the controversies heretofore in question.

The portions of said railway examined and at that time reported on extend from the west bank of the Mississippi River, opposite Thalia street, New Orleans, La., in a northwesterly direction, near said river, 60 miles, to near the town of Donaldsonville, in T. 11 S., R. 15 —; also from Bayou Lamourie, in T. 2 N., R. 1 E., to a point in T. 4 N., R. 2 W., a distance of 20 miles; also from the junction of said railway with the Texas and Pacific Railway, in Shreveport, La., southwardly to T. 10 N., R. 12 W., a distance of 50 miles.

The second report bears date 15th of November, 1882, and relates to such portions of said railway as were not examined and reported on in October, 1881, amounting to 198 miles, lying between New Orleans and Shreveport.

The commissioner reports said portions of road, 328 miles in all, as constructed in substantial compliance with law and the instructions of this Department.

In view of the facts and the law of the case, I regard the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company as the lawful assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and entitled to the lands granted by the twenty-second section of the act of March 3, 1871, to said latter-named company, and to patents therefor in so far as it has earned or hereafter may earn the same under that act, with the exception below named, and recommend that you accept said three hundred and twenty-eight miles of said road, less and exclusive of sixty-eight miles of the line of said New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg road, extending from New Orleans to White Castle, between New Orleans and Shreveport (to which sixty-eight miles the New Orleans Pacific road has withdrawn its claim and right to receive lands under the twenty-second section of said act), and that patents for such lands as may have been earned by the construction be issued to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company (exclusive, nevertheless, of lands along said sixty-eight miles) on their compliance with the law and regulations in such case made and provided.

These patents will, of course, be subject to rights acquired by any person or corporation prior to the act of March 3, 1871.

Requesting that the inclosures herewith be returned to this Department when no longer needed for the purposes hereof,

I am, very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT.

(Indorsements:) Department of the Interior, March 13, 1883. H. M. Teller, Secretary, submits to the President report of commissioner on 328 miles of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad, with recommendations.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 16, 1883.

The within recommendations are approved.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

Mr. PAYSON. That is enough for my purpose. That opinion of Secretary Teller, of the Interior Department, is indorsed by the President of the United States, who confirms his recommendation and directs the patent to issue.

In addition to that, Secretary Kirkwood, when he was Secretary of the Interior—and no man who has ever heard of him will insist or intimate that he would swerve from the line of duty against the rights of the people—recognized this company as entitled to the benefits of this grant, and classed it as a land-grant road in his report made in 1881. Secretary Teller so classed it in both of his reports, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office has done the same thing in the letters to which I have called the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] and this House. The committees of this House in both the Forty-fifth and the Forty-sixth Congresses determined the same thing. The Senate Committee on the Pacific Railroads in the Forty-seventh Congress did the same thing. The Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Brewster, delivered a long and exhaustive opinion, which I will ask leave to print in connection with my remarks, holding that this company was entitled to the benefits of this grant.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., June 15, 1882.

SIR: By a letter dated the 5th of January last, your predecessor submitted to me a number of question arising upon an application of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company for certain lands claimed under the land grant made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, chapter 122.

The land grant mentioned is contained in the twenty-second section of that act, which provides:

"That the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect, by the most eligible route, to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right of way through the public land to the same extent granted hereby to the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, thence by the way of Alexandria, in said State, to connect with the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public lands per mile, in the State of Louisiana, as are by this act granted in the State of California to said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and said lands shall be withdrawn from market, selected, and patents issued therefor, and opened for settlement and pre-emption, upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company, within said State of California: Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act."

The eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, as fixed by the same act, was a point at or near Marshall, Tex.

The New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company was incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana passed December 30, 1869, which authorized it to construct and operate a railroad "from any point on the line of the New Orleans, Jackson, and Great Northern Railroad, within the parish of Livingston, running from thence to any point on the boundary line dividing the States of Louisiana and Mississippi," the route here indicated lying east of the Mississippi River. It was also authorized to construct and operate a branch railroad from its main line (above described) to the city of Baton Rouge; and for the purpose of connecting its railroad with the railroads of other companies, &c., it was furthermore authorized "to construct, maintain, and use, by running thereon its engines and cars, such branch railroads and tracks as it may find necessary and expedient to own and use;" and such branch railroads were, for all the purposes of the act, to be deemed and taken to constitute a part of the main line of its railroad within the State of Louisiana.

On November 11, 1871, that company filed in the General Land Office a map designating the general route of a road projected thereby from Shreveport, by way of Alexandria, to Baton Rouge, and thereupon a withdrawal of the public lands along the same was ordered, which became effective in December following.

Subsequently, by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana passed December 11, 1872, the same company was given "full power and authority to commence the construction of their road in the city of New Orleans or Shreveport, or at any intermediate point on their line of road, as may best suit the convenience of said company and facilitate the speedy construction of a continuous line from the city of New Orleans to the city of Shreveport, or perfect railroad communication with the Texas Pacific Railroad, or any other railroad in Northwestern Louisiana, at or near the Louisiana State line: Provided, however, That the said company shall construct the line of its road between the city of New Orleans and the city of Baton Rouge on the east side of the Mississippi River, to the corporate limits of the said city of Baton Rouge, or adjacent thereto."

In the mean time, by the act of Congress of May 2, 1872, chapter 132, the Texas and Pacific Railway Company (formerly styled the Texas Pacific Railroad Company) was "authorized and required to construct, maintain, control, and operate a road between Marshall, Tex., and Shreveport, La., or control and operate any existing road between said points of the same gauge as the Texas and Pacific Railroad." The same act further provided that "all roads terminating at Shreveport shall have the right to make the same running connections, and shall be entitled to the same privileges, for the transaction of business in connection with the said Texas Pacific Railway, as are granted to roads intersecting therewith."

On February 13, 1873, a second map was filed in the General Land Office by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, designating the general route of a road projected thereby from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, and a withdrawal of the public lands along the same was ordered, which took effect in April, 1873. The route between those places, those designated, lies on the east side of the Mississippi River. That company has not constructed any part of its road, either on the route between New Orleans and Baton Rouge or on the route between the latter place and Shreveport; nor, indeed, has there been a definite location of its road anywhere between the points mentioned. Nothing beyond the designation of the general route thereof appears.

Pursuant to a resolution of its board of directors, adopted December 29, 1880, all the right, title, and interest of that company in and to the aforesaid grant of public lands made by the act of March 3, 1871, were deeded by it to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company. This action of the board of directors and officers of the former company was afterward approved and ratified by the stockholders thereof at a meeting held in December, 1881.

The New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was originally incorporated under the general laws of the State of Louisiana in June, 1875. Its charter was subsequently amended by acts of the Louisiana Legislature, passed February 19, 1876, and February 5, 1878. It is thereby authorized to construct a railroad "beginning at a point on the Mississippi River, at New Orleans or between New Orleans and the parish of Iberville, on the right bank of the Mississippi, and Baton Rouge on the left bank, &c., or from any point within the limits of this State, and running thence toward and to the city of Shreveport," which is made its northwestern terminus.

The route of this company as projected is understood to extend from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, and thence by way of Alexandria to Shreveport. Between New Orleans and Baton Rouge it lies on the west side of the Mississippi River, while the designated route of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company between the same points lies on the east side of that river. Between Baton Rouge and Shreveport its general course and direction correspond in the main with the route designated by the last-named company. It is throughout its entire length from New Orleans to Shreveport within the limits of the before-mentioned withdrawals of public lands.

In October, 1881, the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company made affidavit that three sections of its road were then completed and ready for examination by the Government; whereupon a commissioner was appointed to examine the same the result of whose examination appears in a report made by him to the Secretary of the Interior under date of the 26th of that month. One of the sections embraces sixty-eight miles of road, beginning on the west bank of the Mississippi River, opposite New Orleans, and ending near the town of Donaldsonville; another embraces twenty miles of road near Alexandria; and the third embraces fifty miles of road terminating at Shreveport. For each of these sections lands are claimed by that company under the aforesaid land grant, as assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

No map of definite location of any portion of its road has been filed, other than those of constructed portions.

It appears that in February, 1881, the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company purchased from Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company the road constructed on the west bank of the Mississippi River by the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas Railroad Company, from Westwego to White Castle, a distance of sixty-eight miles, and that the same has become a part of the main line of the road of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

The following are the questions submitted:

"1. Was the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company a grant in præsenti?

"2. Had the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, at the date of its alleged transfer of lands to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, such an interest in the lands, under said act, as was assignable?

"3. Is the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company such a successor to or assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company as is contemplated by said act?

"4. Should it appear that the sixty-eight miles of the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas Railroad was constructed prior to the act of March 3, 1871, granting lands to aid in the construction of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad, can the New Orleans Pacific Company (its assignee) claim any benefit from the grant? Or in case of such prior construction, and the nonconstruction of any portion of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg road, has the purpose for which the grant was made failed and the grant consequently lapsed?

"5. If the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas road was constructed subsequently to the date of said act, is so much of its road as is now owned by the New Orleans Pacific Company such a road as is contemplated for acceptance by the President within the meaning of said act, and may patents issue to the latter for lands opposite to and conterminous with such constructed portion of road?"

These questions are accompanied by a request for an opinion upon such other questions of law as may suggest themselves touching the transfer of said land grant to which reference is above made.

Of the above-stated questions the first three may be considered together, in connection with the following inquiry, which presents itself at the outset: whether the assent of Congress to the transfer made by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its interest in said land grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is necessary (by reason of anything in the provisions of the grant itself) to entitle the latter company to the benefit of said grant in aid of the construction of the road projected by it?

The act of March 3, 1871, passed to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge, and Vicksburg Railroad Company a present interest in a certain number of alternate sections of public lands per mile within the limits there prescribed. Its language is, "there is hereby granted to the said company" the number of alternate sections mentioned; words which import a grant in præsenti, and not one in futuro, or the promise of a grant. (97 United States Reports, 496.) But the grant thus made is in the nature of a float. It is of sections to be afterward located, their location depending upon the establishment of the line of the road. Until this is definitely fixed the grant does not attach to any specific tracts of land. Upon the line of road being definitely located the grant then first acquires precision, and the company becomes invested with an inchoate title to the particular lands covered thereby, which can ripen into a perfect title only as the construction of each section of twenty miles of road is completed and approved, when the right to patents for the lands opposite to and conterminous with such constructed section accrues.

The proviso in the grant that the company shall complete the whole of its road within five years from the date of the act is a condition subsequent, the failure to perform which does not ipso facto work a forfeiture of the grant, but only gives rise to a right in the Government to enforce a forfeiture thereof. Yet in order to enforce a forfeiture such right must be asserted by a judicial proceeding, authorized by law, or by some legislative action amounting to a resumption of the grant. (Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wall., 44.) Hence, until advantage is taken of the non-performance of the condition, under legislative authority, the interest of the grantee in the grant remains unimpaired thereby.

Such being the nature and effect of the grant and its accompanying condition, and no action having been taken either by legislation or judicial proceedings to enforce a forfeiture thereof, it follows that at the period of said transfer by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company this company was invested with a present interest in the number of alternate sections of public lands per mile granted by the act of 1871, notwithstanding it was already in default in the performance of the condition referred to, and that it still retained a right to proceed with the construction of the road in aid of which the grant was made until advantage should be taken of the default. But as it had not then definitely fixed the line of its road, although a map designating the general route thereof was duly filed, that interest did not attach to any specific tracts of land, but remained afloat, as it were, needing a definite location of the road before it could become thus attached. Was the interest here described assignable to another company, so as to entitle the latter to the benefit of the grant in aid of the construction of its road between the places named therein without the assent of Congress?

Doubt has perhaps arisen on this point in view of the fact that in one or two instances it has been thought expedient to obtain legislation by Congress confirming or authorizing a similar assignment (see section 2 of the act of March 3, 1865, chapter 88, and section 1 of the act of March 3, 1869, chapter 127), and also in view of the adverse ruling of this Department in the case of the Oregon Central Railroad Company. (13 Opin., 382.) However, a similar assignment made in 1866 by the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company to the Pike's Peak Railroad Company, afterward know as the Central Branch Company, was held to be valid by Attorney-General Stanbery in an opinion given to the Secretary of the Treasury under date of July 25, 1866.

In the latter case the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company, which was incorporated by the State of Missouri with authority to construct a railroad between Hannibal and Saint Joseph, within that State, was, by the Pacific railroad act of July 1, 1862 (section 13), authorized to "extend its road from Saint Joseph, via Atchison, to connect and unite with the road through Kansas, * * * and may for this purpose use any railroad charter which has been or may be granted by the Legislature of Kansas," &c., and by the fifteenth section of the same act it was provided that "wherever the word company is used in this act it shall be construed to embrace the words their associates, successors, and assigns, the same as if the words had been properly added thereto."

Subsequently, in 1863, an assignment was made by that company of all its rights under said act (which included an interest in both a land and a bond subsidy) to the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company, a company previously organized under a charter granted by the Legislature of Kansas. The latter company, having constructed a section of twenty miles of the proposed road west from Atchison, claimed the benefit of the grant made to the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company, as its assignee, and this claim was recognized and allowed, in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney-General. It will be observed, however, that the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company was authorized to "use any railroad charter which has been or may be granted by the Legislature of Kansas," and this, together with the provision in the fifteenth section quoted above, may have been regarded as sufficient to sustain the assignment.

In the case of the Oregon Central Railroad Company, mentioned above, a grant of a right of way through the public lands, and also of alternate sections thereof, was made to that company, "and to their successors and assigns," by the act of May 4, 1870, chapter 69, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line in certain places in Oregon. In August following an instrument was executed by the company assigning all its interest in the grant to the Willamette Valley Railroad Company, and thereupon the question arose whether the grant was susceptible of being thus transferred. The Attorney-General (Mr. Akerman), to whom the question was submitted, after reviewing the various provisions of the act, some of which (see section 5) imposed certain duties and required certain important acts to be performed by the company, decided in the negative, holding that, upon consideration of those provisions, the Oregon Central Company was alone within the contemplation of Congress in respect of the donation made and duties imposed by that act. The words "their successors and assigns," as used in the act, were regarded as words of limitation merely.

But the grounds upon which that decision appears to have been based are not found to exist in the case now under consideration. Here a grant of a certain number of alternate sections of public lands per mile is made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, in and for the construction of a road from New Orleans, by the route indicated, to connect with the eastern terminus of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, which lands are required to be "withdrawn from the market, selected, and patents issued therefor, and opened for settlement and pre-emption upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company." The grant is coupled with no special duties or trusts for the performance of which there is reason to believe the particular company named therein was more acceptable to Congress than any other. Its purpose is to secure the construction of a railroad between the points designated, and whether this purpose be fulfilled by that company or by another company must be deemed unimportant in the absence of any provision indicative of the contrary. The interest derived by the grantee, though it remain only afloat, is a vested interest, and it is held under the same limitations which apply after it develops into an estate in particular lands until extinguished by forfeiture for non-performance of the condition annexed to the grant. I perceive no legal obstacle arising out of the grant itself to a transfer of such interest by the grantee to another company, and should the latter construct the road contemplated agreeably to the requirements of the grant, and thus accomplish the end which Congress had in view, I submit that it would clearly be entitled to the benefits thereof.

The question of the assignability of the interest of the grantee would be more difficult if, after definitely locating the line of its road, and thus attaching the grant to particular lands along the same, it was proposed to transfer that interest to another company for the benefit of a road to be constructed by the latter on a different line, though following the general course of the other road. But in the present case the facts give rise to no such difficulty. The grant had not previous to the transfer become thus identified with a particular line of road, and was thereafter susceptible of location upon the line of the road projected by the assignee (the New Orleans Pacific Company), provided this road met the requirements of the grant in other respects, as to which no doubt is suggested.

My conclusion is that the assent of Congress to the assignment made by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, as above, is not necessary in order to entitle the assignee to the benefit of the land grant in question.

The remaining questions relate to the sixty-eight miles of railroad formerly belonging to the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas Railroad Company, but now owned by the New Orleans Pacific Company, and made a part of its main line between New Orleans and Baton Rouge.

The land grant in question was, as its language imports, made in aid of the construction of a railroad between certain termini, contemplating a road to be constructed, not one already constructed. It has not been the policy of Congress thus to aid constructed roads. Had a constructed road existed at the date of the grant, which extended from one terminus to the other, and afterward the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, instead of entering upon and completing the construction of a road, had purchased the road already constructed, this, it seems to me, would not have satisfied the purposes of the grant so as to entitle the company to the benefit thereof. The same objection would apply where the constructed road extended over only a part of the route contemplated by the grant. So far as I am advised, the action of the Government hitherto has accorded with this view. On the other hand, if such road was constructed subsequently to the date of the grant, and is owned by the grantee or the assignee of the latter, I see no ground for excluding it from the benefit of the grant should it otherwise fulfill the requirements thereof.

Agreeably to the foregoing views, and in direct response to the several questions submitted, I have the honor to reply as follows:

The first, second, and third questions I answer in the affirmative. The fourth question (including the alternative added thereto) I answer in the negative. The fifth question I answer in the affirmative; assuming, as I do, the company named therein to be an assignee of the grantee in the act referred to.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior.

The Judiciary Committee of this House with practical unanimity, but two members dissenting, have come to the conclusion that legally the grant could not be interfered with.

In the Public Lands Committee there was a vote of 6 to 5 on the proposition. More than that, Mr. Speaker, as tending to show how the people more particularly interested regard this question, let me say that in the last Congress every member of the Louisiana delegation was opposed to this action, and in the present Congress, as I understand (although I have not canvassed the delegation), both Senators and all the members from that State, except the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. LEWIS], are opposed to this proposed action; and so far as I know—I make this statement advisedly—there has never come to the Public Lands Committee from a single citizen of Louisiana a petition for this forfeiture.

As to the irregularity that gentlemen allege against the first corporation, that some of its shareholders were swindled, I do not know what what the fact may be; but I do know that no party claiming a dollar's interest in the Baton Rouge Railroad Company has ever appeared before the Public Lands Committee, either in person or by attorney or proxy, in favor of this proposed action; but, on the contrary, every such person has been in favor of defeating this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit to the House whether or not, in view of the law of this case as laid down in the books; in view of the uniform and concurrent action on the part of every one in authority and in both Houses of Congress during all these years; in view of the fact that over $4,000,000 has been invested in the enterprise upon the faith of this grant; in view of the substantial accomplishment of the object the Government had in view, the connection of the city of New Orleans by rail communication with the Pacific Ocean—I appeal to the House whether this Government will keep its compact, whether it will do as between itself and its citizens that which will reflect credit upon itself, or whether it will do what it seems to me many people of this country must concur with me in regarding as akin to absolute repudiation. I trust the bill will not pass. [Great applause.]

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I have understood that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] in the course of his remarks, while I was out of the Hall, made some allusion to myself and to the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad.

Mr. PAYSON. I will gladly repeat what I said. It will take only a moment.

I said it was claimed that a small portion of the road which the gentleman has named was built out of time; and upon that assumption a bill was introduced on this floor for the forfeiture of a portion of its land grant; that a gentleman from Arkansas, and I think it was the gentleman now before me [Mr. JONES], appeared before the Judiciary Committee, of which I was then a member. There was an Indian reservation or something of that kind involved; and although the road had been substantially built, it appeared a portion had been left out: and on account of the pendency of this claim before the Judiciary Committee the Interior Department refused to issue patents. The committee unanimously reported to the House a recommendation in favor of non-forfeiture; and patents were issued, as I understand.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. With a slight deviation, that is a correct statement of the facts. The charter of the Fort Smith Railroad Company required that a road should be built from Little Rock to a point opposite Fort Smith within a given time. The road was actually built from Little Rock to a point opposite Fort Smith within the time required. But a mile or perhaps less than a mile of that road ran across the territory of the Indian nation; and after the expiration of the time the Indian nation complained of the road across their territory. The Secretary of the Interior required the company to tear up that portion of its road. They came back down the river four miles, I believe, and built their road on the south side of the river from Van Buren to Fort Smith, instead of the north side. But the portion of the road rebuilt at the dictation of the Secretary of the Interior was built after the expiration of the time named in the charter.

Mr. PAYSON. That is in substance what I stated. On account of the failure to build that portion of the road within the time a bill was introduced here for some kind of a forfeiture. The point I was making was, that in the history of this legislation it has happened that there had been one attempt to forfeit a land grant on account of the road not having been fully built within the time, and Congress had in that case refused to declare a forfeiture.

Mr. LEWIS. I now move the previous question.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to make a request. I ought to have the right to be heard on this question for the reason that nine-tenths of the land involved and nine-tenths of the people more particularly interested are in my district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman may submit a request, but debate is not in order.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. VAN EATON. We can vote down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask for a few minutes to make a statement.

Mr. PAYSON. I hope the gentleman's request will be granted.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman desires to occupy time on this bill the question arises, upon what side is he going to speak?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana desires to make a statement to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. COBB. I do not know on which side he is. I shall object unless I know on which side he is; the other side so far to-day has had all the time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have one other request. If I am denied the poor privilege of being heard——

Mr. COBB. It is not a poor privilege.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask leave to print some remarks on this bill in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ELLIS. I make the same request.

Mr. HUNT. And so do I.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and leave is granted accordingly.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I think under the rules I have an hour after the previous question, and I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PAYSON. If I understood the gentleman from Louisiana, he claims he is entitled to an additional hour.

Mr. LEWIS. I have it under the rules of the House.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection but——

Mr. LEWIS. I intend to use that hour to suit myself and on my own side.

Mr. PAYSON. May I be recognized for a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. The inquiry I desire to make is this: Whether after the previous question has been ordered by the House the gentleman having charge of the bill, although it has come over from a previous day, can still occupy an hour in debate? I am not objecting, but I wish to know what is the rule.

Mr. LEWIS. That is the rule.

Mr. PAYSON. I know what the ruling has been.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the third clause of Rule XIV.

Mr. HENLEY. Is the gentleman trying to stop this debate?

The Clerk read as follows:

3. The member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close, where general debate has been had thereon; and if it shall extend beyond one day, he shall be entitled to one hour to close, notwithstanding he may have used an hour in opening.

Mr. PAYSON. That does not meet the question. The question I make is whether the gentleman having charge of a bill, if he chooses to move the previous question and it is ordered by the House, can take the floor and hold it for an additional hour of debate? Does not the ordering of the previous question cut him off?

Mr. REED. I ask that the first part of Rule XVII be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of members present, if a quorum, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the House to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered.

Mr. LEWIS. That is the general rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). The Chair is of the opinion that the third clause of Rule XIV governs in this case. It is his duty to give effect to all the rules, and the two which have been cited, the fourteenth and seventeenth, are not inconsistent with each other when construed together. The gentleman from Louisiana having reported the pending bill from the Committee on Public Lands, and the debate having extended beyond one day, is entitled to one hour after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. REED. Read the third clause of Rule XXVIII, which shows no debate can be allowed after the previous question has been ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is when there has been no debate.

Mr. HENLEY. There has been a ruling.

Mr. REED. It confines debate upon the previous question to where there has been no debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That does not apply to this case.

Mr. REED. That is the only provision for debate after the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It applies where there has been no debate, and there thirty minutes is allowed, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. REED. I understand the Speaker of the House to have ruled otherwise.

Mr. HENLEY. I call for the regular order. The Speaker has ruled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Questions of order ought to be settled as they arise.

Mr. REED. I have not the slightest desire as to this question. I simply raise the question now in the interest of the orderly business of the House. It is desirable that there should be an established rule upon the subject, and not a variation from it. If the present occupant of the chair upon an examination of the matter has come to the conclusion that under the rules of the House, fortified by the opinions of the Speaker of the House, an hour's debate is allowed under the circumstances here pending, I have no personal objection. I desire simply that the matter should be well considered by the present occupant of the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair has observed the practice that has prevailed under the rules of the House in this respect since he has been a member, and desires the Clerk to read a portion of the digest on page 277.

The Clerk read as follows:

The right of the "member reporting the measure" to open and close debate is not affected by an order, either for the previous question or that debate shall cease in committee.

Mr. REED. When was that decision?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the first session of the Thirty-first Congress.

Mr. REED. But that was under the old rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules of the House have not been changed in that respect.

Mr. REED. I think the rules have been changed since that decision took place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not in that respect. The Chair has decided the point of order, and there is nothing further in order in reference to it, unless an appeal be taken.

The gentleman from Louisiana yields ten minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY].

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield to him so much of the time as he may desire.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman from Arkansas desires a few moments.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I will not trespass upon the patience of the House by attempting to make any remarks at this time, but shall simply ask leave to print in the RECORD certain remarks that I desire to make.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, that time wears apace and legislation is belated are sufficient reasons why I shall have very little to say to the House on this measure; but there were some observations submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to which I shall make some brief response; and I first desire his attention particularly, because I wish to interrogate him upon a certain matter of fact which is not altogether clear in my memory just now. The question I desire to address to him is this: I understood him to assert, while giving the legislative history of this land grant, that there had been no effort in the way of forfeiture initiated by the introduction of a bill in Congress against the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company before the completion of the road. To the end that all uncertainty may be dispelled I now ask if I understood him correctly?

Mr. PAYSON. To my knowledge that is so except a resolution that I introduced myself in the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HENLEY. I understood that to be the statement. That both illustrates and admonishes us how a man ought not to too vauntingly proclaim his ability to speak ex cathedra and as if with indisputable information as to all matters of fact or law connected with a legislative land grant.

The gentleman with great vociferation assumed from first to last that he was familiar with every step in connection with the legislative history of this grant in its minutest detail, and asserted that no hostile or inimical measures of legislation having the purpose of forfeiture of this grant as against the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company had been commenced up to a certain time; that is, up to the time or until after the road had been completed. After such a statement the gentleman, and doubtless the country, will be astonished at learning that I hold in my hand a bill to forfeit this same grant, introduced long before the completion of this road by a Democratic member from the State of Louisiana, big enough and plain enough and emphatic enough to have challenged the attention of the gentleman from Illinois who claims to have been one of the most watchful members of this House upon these matters. The title of it is "A bill to forfeit the title to the lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company." This bill was introduced in the House on the 24th day of May, 1878, in the Forty-fifth Congress, second session. And more than that——

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HENLEY. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. That is precisely what I stated, that in the Forty-fifth Congress a bill was introduced forfeiting the grant made for the benefit of the New Orleans and Pacific road, and the committee reported in favor of giving the New Orleans Pacific the benefit of the grant.

Mr. HENLEY. No, sir; I beg pardon, this was to forfeit the grant to the company I have stated, and the gentleman puts himself in error. I have the bill before me. The latter part of the bill or the recommendation of the committee in its report is to make the transfer from one corporation to the other, but that is all.

Mr. PAYSON. That is precisely what I stated.

Mr. HENLEY. I do not think it is what the gentleman stated.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman from California permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HENLEY. Wait a minute. The gentleman from Illinois stated it was reported and could not be acted upon because of the crowded condition of the calendars. I find here it was read twice, referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELLIS. Who introduced it?

Mr HENLEY. A Democratic member from the State of Louisiana, Mr. Elam.

Mr. ELLIS. He made the report to transfer it to the New Orleans Pacific.

Mr. HENLEY. The report speaks for itself.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] upon his successful evangelization and conversion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to the peculiar views that have hitherto been enunciated by the gentleman from Alabama, from which the gentleman from Illinois has hitherto dissented upon all occasions. Apropos of that, and as something that logically should be associated with it, the gentleman from Illinois, we find in the printed report accompanying this bill, in which he joined with a minority, did not place his antagonism to the views of the majority in favor of the forfeiture upon any legal ground whatever. On the contrary, he said he dissented; and in a report filed by himself attached to the minority report he expressly dissents from the legal grounds urged by the gentleman from Alabama and the other members of the minority of the committee, and states that he places his objection to the forfeiture solely upon the ground of the equities existing on the part of this company. He explicitly denies the soundness of the legal propositions of the minority.

Now what do we see? Why the gentleman seems to have consulted his books. While heretofore the equities only were in favor of this company he now discovers that both equity and law were on its side. He said just now that he was familiar with the law bearing on this question, and he challenged contradiction upon various legal propositions that are involved in this forfeiture. He proclaimed he had consulted every authority and familiarized himself with all the decisions. While in his minority report he places his grounds of antagonism to the forfeiture solely on the equities that inure to this company, he now consumes more than half his time in arguing strictly legal propositions in regard to which he previously dissented from the other members of the committee who joined in the minority report. So that we find, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from Illinois has so constantly and so assiduously given attention to these land-grant matters—we find that since the filing of the report in a very short time his position has been completely revolutionized in regard to those great leading principles enunciated by many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and with which an able lawyer as he is, and every other lawyer in this House who has ever bestowed any attention to these questions, should have been thoroughly familiar.

There is another point to which I must advert, and I desire the House to give me its close attention thereupon. We find ourselves in our efforts to forfeit this land grant confronted with what I admit ought to be a very formidable obstacle, to wit, the report of the Judiciary Committee of this House, in which they seem to take ground adverse to the majority report of the Public Lands Committee. In one portion of that report the following passage occurs:

The legal right, therefore, of one who has incurred a forfeiture by breach of condition-subsequent, to relief against an unwilling adversary, upon a substantial performance after the day, at law, and in equity, and undoubtedly in the latter forum, can not be denied.

The foregoing passage occurs in that portion of the report of the Judiciary Committee where its distinguished chairman, Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, is making the point that equity will relieve against forfeiture in cases analogous to the one under consideration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the trouble about that is this—and it will occur to the minds of all who have deeply considered this question—the difficulty is that the Committee on the Judiciary have failed to draw a distinction, which is wide and broad and deep upon this question, between a public and a private grant. And right here I may state that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] regaled this House with a statement as to the law in adjudicated cases and in the text-books governing forfeiture of grants between private individuals; and he challenged the House to furnish one single authority that was in contravention of the principle which he then proclaimed was the correct one. But while the gentleman stated the law correctly as between private parties, he failed to advise the House that it was as to private grants that he was speaking. And I think the House generally understood him to be purporting to state the law governing public grants. Because, sir, why under the sun did we want to know anything about private grants in connection with this bill?

What does this House want to know? Obviously enough, the law in reference to public grants. And why should the gentleman expend his learning and his energy and consume our valuable time in challenging contradiction of the principles he enunciated with reference to the law as to private grants? The gentleman did not say that he was treating of "grants between private individuals;" he said "grants upon conditions." But I supposed, of course, that he meant grants generally, public as well as private. I do not believe he had an auditor on this floor who did not participate with me in that belief, because I assumed his remarks had some pertinence and that he was not indulging in mere idle talk.

This case, Mr. Speaker, is that of a legislative grant to a private corporation in which all of the leading principles governing grants between private individuals are entirely reversed. As for example, it is familiar to all lawyers in construing a grant between private individuals you construe them more strictly against the grantor. The principle is directly reversed in the case of a public grant; it is of no use to marshal authorities upon so familiar a proposition; in that case the grant is construed more strictly in favor of the grantor, and the grantee takes nothing by implication or construction that the gentleman did not mention.

The Judiciary Committee say, and the gentleman from Illinois concurs in that view, that a forfeiture in this case can not be invoked and that a court of equity would relieve against it. Now, sir, I admit in a proper case a court of equity will do so as between private individuals, that is, if the grantee shows a sufficient reason in equity why the estate should not be forfeited. But while in the forum of equity, as is well known, an individual may be heard to declaim against the oppression and harshness of the condition, and obtain a decree relieving him from forfeiture, it is not so with reference to legislative grants. You may complain of the harshness of the bargain you have made with an individual, but you can not be heard to say in a court of equity that the condition of a legislative grant or bargain you have entered into is oppressive, or wrong, or harsh. I say to the gentleman from Illinois, and to any member of the Judiciary Committee who takes the same view, that from lid to lid of any law-book ever written you could not find an adjudication by a court of final resort in conformity with that view.

And that brings us squarely confronting face to face the great underlying principle upon which this bill must be decided. So far as the equities are concerned it may be possible that the parties against whom this legislation is directed are invested with certain equities. But the facts in connection therewith were so confused and involved and intermingled with other matters that the majority of the Committee on Public Lands were unable to determine with precision and accuracy whether they had equities or not. There were charges and denials, criminations and recriminations, until we were left in that state of incertitude that we were unable to say (even if we were permitted to do so, if we were not bound by the pledges and platforms made to the people before we came here, which preclude the consideration of mere equities), whether or not the equities in this case were sufficient to grant the indulgence claimed on behalf of this company.

It simply comes down to this one conclusion, and to that I invoke the serious consideration of the members of this House, that there is no question of law in this case as to our legal right to forfeit this grant; mere indulgence is out of the question. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], to support his view of the law, cited the practices of the Interior Department for many years preceding; the action of Mr. Delano, for example, the action of Mr. Schurz, the action of various preceding Secretaries of the Interior, in cases where roads had been constructed after the time prescribed in the act and patents had been issued to the companies.

I ask the gentleman if the Secretary of the Interior had acted, how could any contest be raised in reference to the rights of these companies? The Secretary acts and that ends it, and no question is raised. That is one point that the House must not lose sight of; that in this legislation we simply endeavor to give to the Government of the United States and to the people the opportunity to go into the courts and litigate and contest their rights. If they have no rights, then these railroad corporations are not injured; and if they have rights, then as a matter of course no one should complain. Take the case of Farnsworth against the Minnesota and Pacific Railroad Company (92 United States Reports, 68). I will cite that case as an answer to the position assumed by the Committee on the Judiciary, where they seem to confound the principles pertaining to public and private grants. I read from that case:

> But it is said that provisions for forfeiture are regarded with disfavor and construed with strictness, and that courts of equity will lean against their enforcement. This as a general rule is true when applied to cases of contract, and the forfeiture relates to a matter admitting of compensation or restoration; but there can be no leaning of the court against a forfeiture which is intended to secure the construction of a work in which the public is interested, where compensation can not be made for the default of the party—
> As nobody can contend that it can be made here—
> nor where the forfeiture is imposed by positive law.

"Where any penalty or forfeiture," says Mr. Justice Story, "is imposed by statute upon the doing or omitting some particular act, there courts of equity will not interfere to mitigate the penalty or forfeiture if incurred, for it would be in direct contravention of the legislative will." (Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 1326.) The same doctrine is asserted in the case of the Duke of Somerset vs. Peachy, reported in 1 Strange R., and in that of Keating vs. Sparrow, reported in 1 Ball and Beatty. In the first case Lord Macclesfield said that cases of agreements and conditions of the party and of the law are certainly to be distinguished.

Again I assert, and for the last time, that lawyers and jurists may ransack cases in vain to find a solitary one where it has been held by a court of last resort that this principle may be invoked to prevent the forfeiture of a legislative grant.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] says that time is not of the essence of the contract. Mark it, Representatives, that was the square declaration on the part of that gentleman. From the eminence which he has attained, and justly attained, by his preceding efforts in these matters before the House and the country, I have no doubt that declaration had its weight and influence with those who were listening to him. He says that time is not of the essence of the contract. I could find abundant authorities to show that it is; but I will read from the latest work I have been able to find in the library, Tiedeman on Real Property. Tiedeman is a professor in the University of Missouri. In section 276 of that work he says, speaking of estates upon condition:

> If there is a time specified within which the condition is to be performed, it can not be performed afterward. Where there is no express specification of time, it must be determined from the apparent intention of the grantor or testator, as gathered from the context or nature of the condition.

I will not consume the time of the House in reading further authorities. I aver my ability, if time did not press and circumstances were such as to justify my making a presentation of them—I aver my ability to show to the House that time has been held to be of the essence of this character of contracts, and that is the established law, sustained by a long current of decisions heretofore, and is now held to be by the text writers of the land.

Mr. LEWIS. And was held by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] in every action of his in the committee.

Mr. HENLEY. I must say that the position of the gentleman from Illinois has struck me with amazement, possibly because I did not heretofore understand the attitude which he assumed in respect to these principles of law, or possibly because I may not understand him now. But as I do understand him, his attitude, as proclaimed by himself this afternoon, constitutes a complete reversal of the position assumed by him heretofore.

Mr. Speaker, something has been said as to the position of the delegation from Louisiana on this measure. I do not know anything about that. I do know the danger that frequently assails the political fortunes of gentlemen in a State whose political doctrines may be dominated by railroad influences. I do not believe there is a member of that delegation who would consciously be influenced by anybody belonging to a railroad corporation except in favor of what he believed to be right. But, sir, there are unconscious operations of the mind by which we are swayed, and I need not turn to the pages of the great masters of mental and moral philosophy in order to impress that upon the House. A gentleman from a district traversed by a portion of this road is in favor of this forfeiture. Other gentlemen from the same State seem to think they should not support it. It may be that these gentlemen are influenced by the pledge given by their predecessors in Congress to these railroad projectors that this grant should not be forfeited in the event that they would go on and complete this road. I do not know that it would be discreditable to those gentlemen to have some regard for a fact of that kind. Influenced, for aught I know, to some extent by that pledge, believing as they may have believed that it was for the best interests of the country that this road should be constructed, they may have been participants to some degree in that pledge. I do not know and do not care how that fact may be. I have no criticisms——

Mr. HUNT. Does the gentleman mean to say that I am involved in any pledge of any kind——

Mr. HENLEY. No, sir.

Mr. HUNT. Or that I have any disposition except to do what is right?

Mr. HENLEY. Certainly not. I thought I had said that plainly enough. I have no criticism, adverse or otherwise, to bestow on those gentlemen for the votes that they may give, because I suppose they as well as other members are governed by their conscientious convictions in their conduct on this floor.

But because the Louisiana delegation may have undertaken to pledge the future action of this House, is that binding upon this House? By what rule of law, or equity, or human conduct should it be? They may have had their own view in respect to the disposition of the public lands; but they can not pledge the conduct of a succeeding Congress which, for aught they know who made the pledge, may have views entirely the reverse of theirs, and may be opposed to the upholding of any such pledge.

My time is now up, and I yield the floor.

Mr. LEWIS addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LEWIS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. OATES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 78, nays 121, not voting 125; as follows:

Mr. LEWIS. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and, pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. OATES. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OATES. I submit that it is not competent for the gentleman from Louisiana to move a reconsideration of the vote, he having changed his vote for that purpose and so expressed it at the time. I think it has been held that it was not competent, where the announcement of the purpose was made, to make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is only governed by the record of the vote. Any gentleman who voted with the majority, or on the prevailing side in any case, has a right to move a reconsideration.

Mr. OATES. But is it competent to make the change of his vote, announcing his intention at the time?

Mr. KEIFER. That is the parliamentary practice.

The SPEAKER. It has been customary, and the Chair knows of no rule to the contrary.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana that the House do now adjourn. Pending that motion the Chair desires to present a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 472) for the relief of George P. Webster; and

A bill (S. 675) to extend the benefits of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866," approved March 3, 1865.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1721) for a bridge across the Missouri River at White Cloud, in Doniphan County, Kansas;

A bill (S. 1861) for the relief of the Atlantic Alcohol Company, of Atlantic, State of Iowa;

A bill (H. R. 6215) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; and

A bill (S. 81) for the relief of Benjamin F. Pope.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BARR, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOBLITZELL, for this day, on account of sickness.

BACKBONE RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Louisiana that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Would it be in order to move that the House take a recess?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

The question being taken on the question to adjourn, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 87.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 30 members voting therefor—not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 24—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Count the other side.

The negative vote was counted, and there were noes 102—the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, only 24 members voting therefor.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are refused, the yeas and nays are refused, and the motion to adjourn is not agreed to.

Mr. OATES. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I move to amend that motion so that the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night; and I ask unanimous consent that the evening session be assigned for the consideration of business reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain a request for unanimous consent while other matters are pending. Does the gentleman from California move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. ROSECRANS. I do. I move to amend that motion so that the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 56, noes 72.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not required on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. LEWIS. I call for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were not ordered, only 29 members voting therefor—not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] that the House take a recess till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 89.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. WHITE, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. OATES.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 4, noes 112.

The SPEAKER. The noes have it, and the House refuses to take a recess.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I insist on the point that a quorum has not voted.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman made the point as to a quorum too late. The result had been announced.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 77.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to pass the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the House take a recess until half past 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question was taken; and the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered—thirty-four members voting therefor.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, and Mr. ELLIS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ay 1, noes 95.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

Mr. ELLIS. I move a call of the House.

Mr. BLAND. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 72.

Mr. BLAND. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered—thirty-eight members voting therefor.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. ELLIS and Mr. BLAND.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 77.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent that the vote on my motion to table the motion to reconsider made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] be taken to-morrow at 1 o'clock. If that is agreed to we can then adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House should now adjourn this matter will come up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. OATES. The House may not be full at that time, and I have suggested a later hour that there may be the vote of a full House on the motion.

Mr. LEWIS. I am willing to assent to that arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the vote on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table shall be taken to-morrow at 1 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CONNOLLY: Petition of George B. Seamans, M. D., and 48 others, citizens and residents of Pleasant Valley, Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, asking that a pension be granted to George Lampman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON: Petitions and exhibits relative to the inspection of hulls and boilers at Duluth, Minn.—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WHITING: Petition of B. F. Cook and others, of Northampton, Mass., against the Government engaging in the telegraph business—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 27, 1884.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by Rev. NATHAN SITES, of Foo Chow, China.

Mr. GARLAND called the Senate to order, and the Secretary read the following letter:

VICE-PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER, Washington, June 27, 1884.

To the Senate:

Pursuant to the rules, I hereby name and designate Hon. A. H. GARLAND, a Senator from the State of Arkansas, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence this day.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore.

Thereupon Mr. GARLAND took the chair as presiding officer for to-day.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators.

The Secretary called the roll, and thirty-five Senators answered to their names.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the absentees will be called.

The SECRETARY. Messrs. Aldrich, Anthony, Brown, Butler, Camden, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Colquitt, Cullom, Dolph, Edmunds, George, Gibson, Gorman, Groome, Hampton, Hawley, Hill, Hoar, Jackson, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McPherson, Mahone, Maxey, Miller of California, Miller of New York, Morgan, Palmer, Pugh, Riddleberger, Sabin, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sewell, Sherman, Vance, Van Wyck, Vest, Voorhees, Williams, and Wilson—41.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock. The Committee on Commerce are closing the river and harbor bill, which must be prepared and must be reported; and calling us down to make a quorum or to answer to our names here prevents the public business more than it would be benefited by having the session postponed until 12 o'clock, as I think, and it is so with other committees.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the Committee on Commerce have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. That would obviate the difficulty the Senator intimates.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have that permission for to-day at least.

Subsequently Mr. WILSON, Mr. MAXEY, Mr. PALMER, and Mr. DOLPH entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the motion of the Senator from Kansas, if there be no objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

Mr. CONGER. Now I ask permission of the Senate that the Committee on Commerce for to-day, at any rate, have leave to sit during the session of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I think leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate has already been granted to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. It has not been granted.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought it had been.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that permission be granted to the Committee on Commerce to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. For this one day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that motion will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings will be read.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, retransmitting a report of Professor J. E. Nourse, United States Navy, on the Suez Canal, which had been returned to the Department for the purpose of adding important information received since the report was transmitted; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, recommending an increase of the appropriations proposed to be made for certain items of expenditure in his Department by the sundry civil appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer in part to a resolution of the 20th instant, a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, inclosing copies of contracts made by the United States with citizens for furnishing beef-cattle to the Indians during the years 1883 and 1884; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of James Northrup and 23 others, Union soldiers and sailors, residents of Jones County, Iowa, praying for certain legislation in the interest of soldiers and sailors of the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a petition of citizens of Orange County, Indiana, praying for the passage of the bills granting pensions to the Union soldiers and sailors of the late war; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. I present the petition of R. M. Morgan and 96 other soldiers of the Union Army, of the State of Indiana, praying for the passage of the bills now before Congress for increase of pensions. The petition was forwarded to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] and he handed it to me to present to the Senate. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of the Southern Exposition Company, of Louisville, Ky., praying for an appropriation for exhibits at that exposition illustrative of the several departments of the Government of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PIKE presented the memorial of Hon. George W. Nesmith and 30 other citizens of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the transfer of the Geodetic Survey in the several States from the Coast Survey to the Geological Survey; which was referred to the Committeee on Appropriations.

Mr. LOGAN. I present an amendment sent to me by request of a committee to be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is an amendment to the laws that exist in reference to plumbers in the city of Washington. There is a petition in connection with it signed by a number of persons from different cities of the United States. I was asked by this committee to present it to the Senate. I do so at their request, and ask its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia for its consideration. I do this at the request of the committee. I know nothing about the matter myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The papers will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report adversely the bill (S. 603) for the relief of William McGarrahan, and to state that the chairman has been instructed to prepare a report, which will be hereafter submitted. I ask that the bill may be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2170) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2347) to incorporate the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, although I do not know what the practice of the Senate has been in referring similar bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. It should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 2348) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2349) authorizing a seal for the United States Pension Office; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE SIGNAL SERVICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the call for "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON]. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to collate the various laws under which the Signal Service is organized, and to report a codification thereof with such amendments as he may suggest at the commencement of the next session of Congress. That he also report the status in the Army of the chief officer of the Signal Service Bureau, and the propriety of keeping the said bureau under the general supervision of the War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish in that connection to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to what has probably escaped his observation in the sundry civil appropriation bill. As it comes to us from the House of Representatives there is found in connection with the appropriations for the Signal Service the following provision:

That a joint commission, consisting of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall consider the present organizations of the Signal Service, Geological Survey, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department, with the view to secure greater efficiency and economy of administration of the public service in said bureaus; and said joint commission shall report to their respective Houses on the first Monday in December, 1884, their conclusions, by bill or report.

It will be observed by Senators that there is already a proposition which comes to us from the House for joint action by the two Houses by a commission to be composed of Senators and Members to examine into this whole question as to the Signal Service Bureau, and to report such conclusions as they may arrive at touching its future management and control. The commission thus appointed will represent the legislative body that must deal with this question. They will have the advantage of access to the Secretary of War. They would undoubtedly call the Secretary of War before them, take his advice, hear his statements with reference to this bureau, which is now under his Department, and they would formulate some report upon the subject, perhaps propose some bill, as they are directed to do if they think best. This certainly is a better way of getting at it than simply to ask the advice of the Secretary of War and have that come to Congress and then have that go to some committee or commission upon which they must act.

The Senator from Ohio will see that if the Senate adopts this provision of the sundry civil bill we shall expedite the inquiry which he seems to desire to make into the Signal Service. It will be made by those who will be on the floor of the House and on the floor of the Senate to explain and defend the conclusion at which they may arrive; whereas if his resolution is passed we shall simply have sent to this body at the first day of the next session the views of the Secretary of War alone, and those views as thus expressed must go to the Committee on Military Affairs or some other committee of this body and have their consideration before we shall have any report or any legislation proposed to us at all.

If there be something here that ought to be investigated this commission will do it, having all the necessary machinery and appliances for a full investigation. If the advice of the Secretary of War is important the commission will have it, and will present it to us in their report together with whatever information they may derive from other sources. So, it is a wider, a safer, and a quicker inquiry into this matter than the proposition of the Senator from Ohio.

I would not desire that the resolution in the shape in which it is should pass without an examination by a committee at least. I hope therefore it will go to the Committee on Military Affairs in order that they may consider whether the proposition of the Senator from Ohio or the proposition contained in the sundry civil bill is the better, or, if stimulated by his resolution, they should think best to modify the proposition of the House it can be done, and will be in the shape of legislation.

Mr. MAXEY. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I concur very heartily in what has been said by the Senator from Indiana. It is a fact that the Committee on Military Affairs have give a great deal of attention to the subject-matter of the Signal Service Bureau. A subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and myself, took charge of that matter, and we spent a long time in endeavoring to work out some correct system of organization for the Signal Service Bureau and to make it more effective. There were various communications by the Secretary of War upon the subject.

The plan proposed in the sundry civil bill to my mind is the correct plan, and now to take all that work from the proper committee, which is the Committee on Military Affairs, it seems to me would be wrong. That committee has heretofore had charge of it. The Signal Service Bureau belongs to the War Department, and hence the matters connected with that bureau properly belong to the Military Committee. For every reason it seems to me that the business which has already been intrusted by the Senate to the Committee on Military Affairs, relating to the Signal Service Bureau should be kept there.

Mr. PENDLETON. I had not observed the provision in the sundry civil bill to which the Senator from Indiana has called my attention, but if I had done so it would not have affected in any degree my action in offering the resolution. I have no disposition to antagonize that provision of the sundry civil bill, and I have not the least disposition to interfere with any action that the Military Committee has taken or may take in reference to the matter.

I have found a great deal of difficulty in understanding the laws under which this bureau is conducted, the powers that are given to it, the number of men employed in it, the exact function which it is intended to perform, and it was with a disposition of getting information upon that subject, and not of antagonizing the bureau or criticising any of its ways, that I offered the resolution.

I presume that the information desired as to the provisions of law on the subject is in the War Department and can be readily collated; and I desire that the resolution shall pass notwithstanding what has been said by the Senators who have spoken. The provision of the sundry civil bill may not in the end be adopted. I shall not oppose it; I approve of it very highly, but it has only come from the House. The bill is still in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations, and the provision may be stricken out by the committee or it may be non-concurred in by the Senate. The information which I seek is that which we ought to have and which I have no doubt can be very readily furnished to the Senate.

I repeat, it was with no disposition to antagonize the committee or to antagonize this provision of the sundry civil bill that I offered the resolution, but it was in order that the Senate might have in some condensed and proper form the information as to the organization of that bureau.

I trust the Senate will not refer the resolution at this late stage of the session to the Military Committee. We know that the committees are pressed with business which requires immediate attention. The resolution can do no possible harm. It can in no way interfere with the functions of the committee or of the commission which shall hereafter be created, if one be created under the provisions of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

I therefore hope that the gentlemen will withdraw their opposition to the passage of the resolution, as it antagonizes none of the work either of the Military Committee or of the commission, if it shall be adopted, and allow the information to be furnished to the Senate. It will require no additional work, for whatever is done would be necessary to be done for the commission if it should ever be created. If it shall ever be created it will be necessary for that commission to have the information in order to discharge the duties proposed to be intrusted to it in the sundry civil bill. I hope that the resolution will not be referred, but that it will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. The Military Committee meets regularly on Tuesday, and there is no reason in the world why the resolution may not be considered and promptly reported at that time. The Senator from Ohio is seeking by the resolution to get the views of a single man, the head of the War Department.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator pleases, to strike out the provision in reference to his views. That is not what I wanted. If that is the objection that the Senator makes, I have no indisposition to modify the resolution in that way. I did not offer the resolution with any disposition to get the views of a single officer in antagonism either to the proposed commission or the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRISON. The resolution requires the Secretary of War to report a codification of the law regulating the Signal Service, with such amendments as he may suggest. Suppose that report comes to us; it is the expression of the Secretary of War alone; it is an expression upon his own consideration of the question, without any examination or cross-examination, or without any inquiry into the reasons, such as the commission would be able to make.

We should get all the Senator from Ohio asks, every whit of it, through the commission. We should get the views of the Secretary of War as to what changes he thought ought to be made in the law, and the reasons on which these changes are to be based; and we should not only get that, but the views of the General of the Army, and the views of other officers high in rank in the Army, so that we should have for comparison the views of the Secretary of War, and of others whose opinions would be entitled to great respect in this matter. We should have them all before us when the commission made its report.

In other words, the provision in the sundry civil bill embraces all that the Senator from Ohio asks in his resolution and embraces much more, and brings it to us in such a shape that it will be brought here by members of this body who have been connected with the investigation who have made themselves thorough in this inquiry and are able to defend upon the floor any changes that they may recommend to be made in the Signal Service law.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish simply to add to the point the Senator is so well making a statement of the fact that in every investigation which the Committee on Military Affairs makes a thorough interview with the Secretary of War is a part of that investigation, and whatever he thinks about this matter will be laid before the Senate along with a vast amount of other valuable information.

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly that would be true; so that if the Senator from Ohio wants a wide, a searching, a comprehensive, and an intelligent inquiry into the laws regulating the bureau and every other question connected with it, the proposition of the sundry civil bill gives it to him, and it brings it here in the shape of a report based on investigation. I should hope that if such a commission is constituted and the bill is passed we might have the assistance of the Senator from Ohio in looking into this matter, as he has taken an interest in the Signal Service as expressed in his resolution, and then we shall be in a position to act upon it intelligently.

As the Senator from Texas has said, a subcommittee of the Military Committee have given a good deal of attention to this matter, and they did feel that there were probably some changes in the laws regulating that bureau, if I may call it such, that could wisely be made. Some were suggested at the last Congress but were not enacted into law. It seems to me that in a question of this kind, where there need be no haste about its passage, when there is an appropriate committee to consider it, when there are two propositions to be considered it is unusual to object that the appropriate committee should have their day to make an examination of it.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am a little surprised at the sensitiveness of the Senator from Indiana upon this subject. I had no idea that I was treading upon anybody's toes in offering the resolution; but if the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Texas both feel that it is an invasion of the duties of the Military Committee and of the duties that they have taken upon themselves, I shall ask that the resolution lie over until we see what shall be the fate of the provision in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator from Ohio a fact that perhaps he does not know, that the subcommittee to which I referred, by direction of the committee, spent more time I expect upon that single proposition than on any other one proposition that the Military Committee has had under consideration for years.

Mr. PENDLETON. I was entirely unaware that there was a single committee considering the subject.

Mr. MAXEY. I supposed that to be the case. The Secretary of War has been seen time and again in regard to the subject by myself and by the Senator from Connecticut and I think by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. PENDLETON. That was entirely unknown to me. I was not aware that there was any subcommittee considering the subject or that the Military Committee had taken cognizance of it. I ask then that the resolution lie on the table subject to be called up hereafter if necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks that the resolution may lie over subject to his call? Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

THE SENATE MANUAL.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, under the direction of the Committee on Rules, a new edition of the Senate Manual in accordance with the suggestions made in their report.

I ask that the resolution lie over in order that fifteen minutes at least may be spent in its consideration to-morrow morning. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Committee on Rules at the opening of the session, under instructions of the Senate, reported a resolution in terms like this, and in their report they reported certain amendments which they advised in the new edition of the Manual. I will call the attention of Senators to-morrow morning to those recommendations so that if the Senate does not concur with the committee such recommendations as it does not concur in may be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie over subject to the call of the Senator from Maine, and will be printed.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a single question before the resolution passes from the consideration of the Senate. I think when the Senate adopted its new rules, it also adopted, so far as it could, some joint rules. I should like to inquire whether those rules have ever been adopted by the other branch.

Mr. FRYE. I learned on an inquiry which I made a few days since that no action whatever has been taken by the Committee on Rules of the House touching the joint rules.

Mr. PLATT. So we have no joint rules?

Mr. FRYE. We have no joint rules at all.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate a resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Finance Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is absent, and I learn has made a request that the resolution shall go over until his return.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will so lie over if there be no objection.

NEW YORK BANKS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement as to my purpose in reference to the resolution which I had the honor to offer some time ago relating to the New York national banks. I intended to call that resolution up yesterday or to-day, but the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] begged me not to do so until Monday, as he was compelled to be absent from the city. I give notice now that, if the Senate will permit, I shall ask a vote on the resolution on Monday next, by which time the Senator from Rhode Island will have returned.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4680.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CONGER, beginning in line 6, section 6, to strike out the following words:

And after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I move the amendment indicated upon the paper I send to the desk, which is the charter of the Saint Louis and San Francisco road in relation to highways. The Secretary will see what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator inform the Secretary where it is to come in?

Mr. HARRISON. It is to come in at the end of section 9.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 9 it is proposed to insert—

That said railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to inquire of the Secretary, as I have no memorandum of it here, whether the amendment providing that the line shall be located subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior has been incorporated in the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. That was incorporated on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that it has been inserted.

Mr. HARRISON. I am entirely opposed to the bill, but I have no further amendment to offer.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator from Indiana about the amendment he spoke of a moment ago, and ask him whether he will not be willing to have it so modified as that the railroad shall be located, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, in sections say of twenty-five miles?

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose it is too late to amend that amendment, as it has been agreed to in the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. It can be amended by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. It can not be amended in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to reconsider would be entertained by the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall not make any objection. I believe the conference committee on the other bill reported that proposition as to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railroad, and the Senate concurred in it.

Mr. PLUMB. I wanted to obviate the necessity of any conference committee if it could be avoided. The provision as it stands is rather obstructive in its character.

Mr. HARRISON. I said I would make no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I ask unanimous consent that that clause may be amended so that that location shall be made in sections of twenty-five miles, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, before the construction commences.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this request? The Chair hears none. By unanimous consent the correction will be made.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to inquire whether the amendment in relation to the rights of employés of the road was adopted before. I think it was offered, but we passed from the consideration of the bill, and I have no memorandum that will enable me to discover.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will examine and report.

Mr. PLUMB. That was incorporated on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], I think.

Mr. HARRISON. That the employés should be subject to the Indian intercourse laws?

Mr. PLUMB. I find that the same amendment is inserted. It is copied from the RECORD as inserted in the other bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Copied from the conference report?

Mr. PLUMB. Not from the conference committee's report.

Mr. HAWLEY. It might as well be in the terms reported by the conference committee, if it is a matter of disagreement between the two Houses, to avoid a further conference.

Mr. PLUMB. It was not a matter of disagreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now report the amendment corrected by the Senator from Kansas.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment adopted to the bill, after the word "void," in section 6, line 12, "and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before work is begun," strike out the words "before work is begun" and insert:

In sections of twenty-five miles before the construction of any such section shall be begun.

So as to make the clause read:

And said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of twenty-five miles before the construction of any such section shall be begun.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment as amended will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that section 7 was stricken out and the amendment I proposed to the other bill inserted.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment was copied from the RECORD and incorporated in this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Am I right in supposing that section 7 was stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the state of facts.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 7 was stricken out, as follows——

Mr. HARRISON. That will do. It is all right.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask unanimous consent to take up the joint resolution (S. R. 4) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. BROWN February 25, 1884:

The Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 4) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railway Company, respectfully report:

That they have examined into the facts of the case as exhibited in the different laws passed and the reports of the Quartermaster-General and previous reports of committees upon this subject.

By the act of February 27, 1875, "to provide for settlements with certain railway companies," the Secretary of War and Attorney-General were authorized and empowered jointly to adjust and settle the claims of the United States against the Mobile and Ohio and other railway companies named therein for property purchased by them of the United States in the years 1865 and 1866. The Secretary of War reported to the Senate (Executive Document No. 57, Forty-fourth Congress, first session) that under the provisions of that act an abatement of 25 per cent. was found equitable and just in the valuation of the property charged, and that he made that deduction and settled with certain of the roads on that basis in accordance with the provisions of the law. He reported further that he had been unable to make any settlement of the account with the Mobile and Ohio Railway Company for the reason that a settlement on the basis determined on as equitable and just, and on which settlement had been made with the other companies, would bring the Government in debt to the company, and that no means had been provided in the act cited for paying any balance in favor of the company.

It was the evident intention of the law that the companies specially named in it should receive its benefits, and that settlements should be made with them on a common basis. The fact that, after such basis had been determined on, it would leave all the companies except one still in debt to the Government should not be allowed to operate to the detriment of that one. The fact that it had been more prompt than the others in paying the demands of the Government, thereby leaving such a small balance against it, is evidence of the good faith of the company.

This resolution was favorably reported to the Senate by the Committee on Railroads in the Forty-seventh Congress. In the annual report of the Quartermaster-General made to this session of Congress attention is called to the condition of the accounts of the Mobile and Ohio Railway Company, and legislation is recommended for their settlement on an equitable bas s.

In the report of Colonel Chandler he says:

"Three acts of Congress have passed, under which compromises have been effected, and the accounts closed, of several of those indebted railroads upon the basis of a reduction in the value of the property purchased and in the interest charged of 7.3 per cent. per annum. One of these acts, that of February 27, 1875, specially provided for the settlement of the indebtedness of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company, authorizing an equitable abatement in the amount charged against the railroad. Under this act the accounts of the Selma, Rome and Dalton Railroad Company and Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company were closed; but it was found not possible to close the account of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company, because, on an application of the principle considered equitable, a cash payment from the United States to the railroad company was necessary, as the railroad had already paid over $500,000 on its debt, and it was considered that the law did not justify a settlement which would bring the Government in debt. In this case it is suggested that Congress be asked to have some equitable law to close the long-standing account."

The committee believe that the law intended that settlement should be made with each company on the same basis. The fact that settlement on the basis adopted requires the return to the Mobile and Ohio Railway Company of money overpaid by it should not be taken advantage of by the Government from any failure in the law to provide for it.

This resolution is to direct the settlement to be carried out with the Mobile and Ohio Railway Company, and that if it shall be found to require the return of any money it provides that it shall be returned.

We report the resolution back, and recommend that it be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRISON. Was there any consent of the Senate to take up the joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked if there was any objection and heard none.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope that we shall not waste the time that we have now in considering railroad bills. There are a great many pension bills on the Calendar, and I should like to have a little time this morning for them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senate has voted to take it up I suppose we have passed the point where I could object. Otherwise I would.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I presume this is all right if the Senator from Mississippi moves it. Does it come from the Railroad Committee?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir; unanimously recommended by that committee at two Congresses.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well; but I do not recall it.

The joint resolution was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the preamble.

Mr. HARRISON. I have just been informed that this measure has been before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and perhaps the Committee on Claims, and has failed to secure favorable action from either of those committees in previous Congresses. I should like to know whether that is true.

Mr. LAMAR. I am under the impression that the Senator from Indiana is entirely mistaken about that. I am sure it has been unanimously recommended by two Committees on Railroads. There has been an adverse recommendation by the Committee on Claims on another measure, but it has no reference whatever to this and does not involve the same question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it in order now to move to proceed to the consideration of private pension bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The preamble to the joint resolution has not yet been disposed of. The question is on the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado, and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

FISH IN POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. LAPHAM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3108.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not rise for the purpose of antagonizing the proposition of the Senator from New York, but for the purpose of making a suggestion which I think would facilitate the business on the Calendar very much. It is that we proceed to the consideration of the bills which have passed the House and are now on the Calendar, in their regular order.

Mr. LAPHAM. This is one of those.

Mr. BUTLER. I was going to suggest that we proceed with them in order and call them regularly.

Mr. LAPHAM. I will state that this is a House bill to which the Committee on Fish and Fisheries of the Senate have proposed an amendment to stop the flow of gas-tar into the Potomac River, and it is necessary it should pass and get back to the House in order that that amendment may be adopted. It is a very important measure, one to which there is no objection, which is recommended by the District officers, by the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, and is assented to by the gas companies.

Mr INGALLS. The title of the bill was not heard here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill will be reported by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 3108) to protect fish in the Potomac River in the District of Columbia, and to provide a spawning-ground for shad and herring in the said Potomac River.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senate will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania and proceed to dispose of the pension cases on the Calendar.

Mr. LAPHAM. This will take but a moment.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps that is true.

Mr. LAPHAM. I move to take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill whose title has been stated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Fisheries with an amendment, to add as a new section:

SEC. 3. That from and after two months from the date of the passage of this act it shall be unlawful to allow any tar, oil, or other waste products of any gas-works, or of works engaged in using such products, to flow into or to be deposited in Rock Creek or the Potomac River, or into any pipe or conduit leading to the same; and any one guilty of violating this section shall be fined not less than $10 nor more than $100 for each and every offense, to be prosecuted for and recovered as provided in the preceding section.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the following report submitted by Mr. LAPHAM June 17, 1884:

The Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3108) to protect the fish in the Potomac in the District of Columbia, and to provide a spawning-ground for shad and herring in the said Potomac River, have duly considered the same, and respectfully report:

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill as it came from the House. In connection with said bill there have been referred to the committee certain communications and recommendations relative to the flow of oil and other refuse products in the river and its tributaries from the works of the gas-light companies of Washington and Georgetown, which are believed to be very destructive to young fish and fish-spawn.

It appears from the reports of engineers, the letter of Major Hains, who has charge of the river improvement, the letter of Professor Baird and his assistant, Colonel McDonald, of the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, and of Dr. Townshend, the health officer of the District, that the complaints in this respect are well founded.

It also appears from the papers that the said gas companies will arrange to stop the deposit of such waste in the river within two months from the passage of a law prohibiting the same.

The commissioners of the District propose an amendment to the bill, to be section 3 of the same, which your committee report favorably and recommend its passage.

A petition of citizens——

Mr. LAPHAM. It is not important to read the rest of the report.

Mr. PLATT. I want to hear it all.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, as follows:

A petition of citizens engaged in fisheries has been presented, protesting against the passage of the bill in question, and asking, in case of its passage, that the petitioners be paid the value of their several outfits, as stated in said petition, or such portion thereof as may be deemed proper.

Your committee are unable to conceive any ground upon which the prayer of the petitioners asking legislative relief can be granted. They therefore ask to be discharged from further consideration of the same, and ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PLATT. This seems to be a bill to destroy the fisheries that exist in the District of Columbia without compensation, and that portion of the bill seems to be commended to the Senate by an amendment which has been put upon it to prevent the emptying of gas-tar into the river. I am not ready to vote for a bill to prohibit shad-fisheries and other fisheries in the District of Columbia without some explanation of the reason why it should be done. I have had no opportunity to examine the bill and have only heard it read, but I assume that there are parties engaged in shad-fishing here in the District of Columbia that have investments in it which they have been carrying on for a long time, have property rights of fishery; and if I understand the bill, listening to it in the hurried way in which it was read and the confusion which there is in the Chamber, this bill proposes to stop them. I do not think we ought to pass a bill here in the hurry and hurly-burly of this morning hour of the Senate, of that character, without some consideration.

Mr. LAPHAM. This bill provides that for a period of five years, within the limits of the District of Columbia, the use of seines shall be prohibited. The object of it is to enable the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries to convert this portion of the Potomac into a spawning-ground for shad and herring. As the fisheries are now carried on, all efforts to increase the quantity of shad and herring in the Potomac are practically useless by reason of the multitude of seines that are used at the very headwaters of the Potomac, where fish come in the spawning season.

This does not prevent the use of seines outside the bounds of the District of Columbia, and all the persons who are engaged in the fisheries can carry on their operations lower down the river, but they are only prohibited for the period of five years from doing it within the bounds of the District.

The bill passed the House unanimously, as I am informed, if I may state that fact, and it is the unanimous report of the Committee on Fish and Fisheries that that portion of the bill should be recommended for passage to the Senate. It is by no means correct to say that the other provision of the bill which prohibits the flow of gas-tar into these streams is added here to aid in the passage of the provision of which I have spoken. It is added here to aid in the accomplishment of the purpose of the bill, because if this flow of gas-tar is permitted to go into the Potomac the evidence conclusively shows that the use of the river as a spawning-ground will be practically destroyed. This gas-tar comes down the river nearly to Alexandria. The certificate of Major Hains is that his men who are engaged in the river improvement, the divers, come up with their clothing all covered with the gas-tar which is found in the bottom of the river.

The gas companies were compelled to concede that it is an impropriety, and assent to a proposition that they shall stop entirely the flow of this gas-tar into the river after the expiration of two months from the passage of the act, and this amendment has been adopted by the unanimous concurrence of Professor Baird and his assistants, of the District commissioners, of the health officer of the District, and of Major Hains, who is engaged in the river improvement.

There is no possible objection, it seems to me, to the enactment of this measure, and unless it is done the moneys which we are expending through the agency of the national Commission of Fish and Fisheries, so far as the Potomac is concerned, will be expended uselessly. It is here at the headwaters, and here only, that the operations of that commission can be successfully carried on.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the thing that attracted my attention about this bill was the report which, if it had been read leaving out the portion which the Senator from New York said was of no consequence, would never have informed the Senate that there was anything in this bill except to prevent the discharging of gas-tar into the waters of the Potomac. The whole report is based upon that ground, and then, as the Senator from New York said, this portion of the report is of no consequence:

> A petition of citizens engaged in fisheries has been presented, protesting against the passage of the bill in question, and asking, in case of its passage, that the petitioners be paid the value of their several outfits, as stated in said petition, or such portion thereof as may be deemed proper.
> Your committee are unable to conceive any ground upon which the prayer of the petitioners asking legislative relief can be granted. They therefore ask to be discharged from further consideration of the same, and ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to state that that petition asked that we should compensate them for the value of their seines. They sent in a petition, and each appends to his name the value of his seine, and the request was that we should pay them for the expense of their seines. They do not object to this measure; they make no opposition to the passage of the bill; but they seek to get compensation for their seines. I did not see any ground on which we could do that.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know whether they object or not, but I know——

Mr. LAPHAM. They do not.

Mr. PLATT. I know that this portion of the report which the Senator from New York did not want read says——

Mr. LAPHAM. There is no remonstrance against the passage of the bill. The petition itself did not remonstrate.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know about that. I know the report says, or that portion of it which the Senator from New York did not want read, says:

> A petition of citizens engaged in fisheries has been presented protesting against the passage of the bill in question.

Mr. LAPHAM. The Senator should not say I did not want it read.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator suggested that it was of no importance.

Mr. LAPHAM. I only said it need not be read, because the petition had been indefinitely postponed. That was the only ground on which I made that suggestion.

Mr. PLATT. I repeat, that if it had not been for this clause in the report we should have supposed that the bill was simply a bill to prevent the discharge of gas-tar into the Potomac River.

Now, I want to say that I know nothing whatever about the merits of this bill. No one has ever spoken to me on the subject; I never heard of it until the bill was read at the desk; but I think it is of consequence enough that we should not hurry it through in the way which we have adopted of hurrying bills through here, without consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, if I were sensitive upon matters of jurisdiction I perhaps might complain that this bill was not assigned to the Committee on the District of Columbia for consideration, but the Senator from New York advises me sotto voce that it was sent by the Senate to the Committee on Fish and Fisheries, I assume upon the theory that the jurisdiction of the District Committee extends only to the land and not to the waters of the District of Columbia.

It is well known to those who are conversant with this subject that the waters of the Potomac and the East Branch and the other tributaries of the Potomac, which formerly swarmed with fish, have been so depleted by the devices which have been employed and by the detrimental substances which have been permitted to flow into and contaminate the waters of the streams from the various manufacturing establishments in the District, that the fish have practically departed, so that the fishermen who formerly obtained a competent livelihood have of late years been like the disciples upon the Sea of Galilee, who toiled all the night and caught nothing.

It appears to me that the objection urged by the Senator from Connecticut is without foundation. It is true that a certain number of those who are employed in catching fish appeared before the committee and protested; but it seemed to me that it was an instance where individual interests would have to be sacrificed to the common good. The parties who presented their protest to the Committee on the District of Columbia stated that they represented an aggregate of property, perhaps, valued at fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars, which was invested in seines and in the various appliances used in fishing. They also represented that the value of the fishing places would be somewhat damaged; but it is my impression that the passage of this bill will so very largely increase the value of these privileges within a very short time that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be heeded. I therefore very cordially advocate the passage of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether the depletion of the fish has risen from catching the fish or from the gas-tar which he speaks of?

Mr. INGALLS. Probably both of those influences have concurred in the result which every person is familiar with who has given the matter any attention; that is, that these waters which formerly swarmed with the most valuable edible fish, shad, herring, and other varieties, are now practically vacated. The bill which the Senator from New York advocates is unquestionably in the interests of the public of this District and the country at large.

Mr. PLATT. I am yet unable to see how hauling the seine within the District of Columbia destroys the fish any more than hauling it below the limits of the District.

Mr. INGALLS. Because in the District of Columbia are the spawning grounds. The headwaters of the Potomac are found practically within the limits of the District. It is the place where the fish assemble by some mysterious instinct at stated seasons of the year for purposes of propagation. That interesting performance is interfered with by the devices of the fishermen; they are disturbed and they depart, and therefore it is very obvious that this bill should be adopted in order to allow the natural evolution which results in the spawning and hatching of the eggs to go on.

Mr. PLATT. That matter might all be regulated by a close season allowing the matter of fishing to go on through the proper season, and by preventing the use of improper nets for the taking of small fish, as is the custom elsewhere. I undertake to say that nowhere in the United States has there been any law passed or will there be any law passed, unless it be in the District of Columbia, whereby fishing for shad and kindred fish is prohibited for five years. It would not be tolerated anywhere except in the District of Columbia. That whole matter is regulated by the season and by the kind of nets which are used for the purpose of taking the fish. But it is a matter in which I have no interest.

Mr. LAPHAM. I do not know how it is in other localities, but in the State of New York the use of seines in our interior lakes is absolutely prohibited all the year round.

Mr. PLATT. I am talking about the Hudson River where the shad runs. The Senator would not permit it to be done in the State of New York.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire only to add that the report of the House committee, which I supposed was with the papers—I do not see it at this moment—states that in 1868 219,205 shad and 689,392 herring were caught within the limits of this District in a single year, and in 1879 only 21,498 shad and 222,887 herring. The shad-fishing with seines here has been practically useless for the past few years. The most of the shad-fishing is done below the limits of the city in the river, and the men who own seines are really not changed in their practice materially by the passage of this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORIGINAL WASHINGTON PORTRAITS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer an amendment which I intended to propose to the sundry civil bill. I ask that it be read. It is very brief and I desire to call attention to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of 1,000 copies of the book entitled Original Portraits of Washington, by Elizabeth Bryant Johnston, to be distributed to public libraries under the order of the Senate, $12,000.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say that I offer that by the authority of the Senate Committee on the Library, who authorized me to make the report. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT MECHANICS' LIENS.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to call up Order of Business 737, and ask the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to proceed to the consideration of a bill which will be read by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 777, a bill (S. 2244) granting a pension to James Brown.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not desire to antagonize the pension bills, but I repeat my suggestion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If the Senator will permit me, the Order of Business has been improperly called by the Chief Clerk. That is not the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire. It was the Order of Business 737, a District matter.

Mr. PIKE. The bill is House bill 7164, Order of Business 737.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now report the title of the bill correctly.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 737, being the bill (H. R. 7164) to amend chapter 20 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, concerning mechanics' liens.

Mr. BUTLER. I renew my motion that the Calendar be taken up and that the House bills reported from the committees of the Senate favorably be considered in their order and acted upon by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

Mr. PIKE. If I may be permitted to say one word, this bill has passed the House of Representatives——

Mr. MITCHELL. I gave notice this morning early, and I should be glad to have it understood that there is a desire here to insist on the consideration of the private pension bills. I desire the Senate to understand that I will make the motion for their consideration as soon as I can get the floor for the purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. PIKE. I hope I may be permitted to say one word on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. PIKE. This bill passed the House of Representatives without any opposition. It has been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia unanimously. It is a very important bill for the interests of this District; the people here are more interested in it than in any other measure I have had anything to do with during this session of Congress. It is to amend the lien law of the District, which is very defective. I know of no opposition to it, and I think it will take no time beyond the time required to read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object.

Mr. PIKE. I move then that it be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I should not object in the slightest to taking up the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire, and I have no desire to antagonize it, but there are quite a number of other bills on the Calendar in the same situation as the one he has in his hand, and we should get along a great deal better and dispose of a great deal more business by taking up the Calendar and going through regularly with such House bills as have been reported.

Mr. PIKE. That can not be done. I am as much interested in the pension bills as any Senator on this floor, I think, but I am fully persuaded that this bill ought to be acted on and ought to be passed. Every interest in the District requires it, and I hope no Senator will antagonize it, for it will take no time as I understand.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a bill in my hand passed by the House, and reported by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, which I think of equally great importance. The result will be in my judgment that a great deal of time will be consumed in mere contests for position on the floor of the Senate. We shall get along a great deal better by proceeding in regular order. I have no desire whatever to antagonize the particular measure which the Senator has in his hand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the yeas and nays. ["No!" No!"]

Mr. PIKE. It will not take half the time to pass the bill that it will require to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to get to the pension bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. As we are wasting time over this, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to let this bill pass with the understanding that the Chair will recognize him to make his motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to proceed to the disposition of the pension bills. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7164) to amend chapter 20 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia, concerning mechanics' liens.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILWAY.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I move to take up Order of Business 745. I do this very reluctantly; but it will not take three minutes to read and pass the bill. It is very important, and it has had the indorsement of the other House and of two committees unanimously.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe I have never known a time——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be first read by title. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate take up a bill which will be read by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 745, being the bill (H. R. 4977) to authorize the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company to a point on the military lands at Fortress Monroe, Va.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe I have never known a time in the Senate in the brief period I have been here when a request to take up the Calendar of private pension claims was antagonized by anything else. The Senator from Pennsylvania gave way upon urgency to the last application that was made to pass one of these bills, but I hope the Senator from Virginia will let us go through the Pension Calendar now and get it out of the way.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will just say to the Senator from Indiana that this bill is not ten lines long; it will not take three minutes. Let those who are interested in pension bills allow this piece of legislation to go on, and then I will agree to take up the pension bills.

Mr. HARRISON. We have spent the whole morning, and the pension bills have been deferred on just that sort of applications one after another, and the time is running rapidly out and we shall not get to the Calendar at all. I am satisfied there are cases of extreme distress.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The bill could have been passed by this time if the Senator had allowed it to proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. That may be true of forty other bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to one other point——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Senator will proceed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I was a victim a few mornings ago to the misunderstanding between the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Nebraska, and that ought to make some appeal to his charity for me this morning. This bill will not take three minutes.

Mr. INGALLS. There has been no misunderstanding that I know of between the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I refer to what the Senator from Nebraska called the objection of the Senator from Kansas to a bill of his when it was not an objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take up something.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4977) to authorize the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company to a point on the military lands at Fortress Monroe, Va.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM M. FORNEY of Alabama, Mr. RICHARD W. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, and Mr. J. WARREN KEIFER of Ohio managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of pension bills reported favorably on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first pension bill in order on the Calendar.

THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry; and that is whether the Senate meeting at 11 o'clock the morning hour practically expires at 12 and Rule VIII comes into operation at 1 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present incumbent of the chair would hold that the rule is not changed by the change in the hour of meeting.

Mr. INGALLS. The morning hour continues until 2 o'clock; that is, the unfinished business of yesterday will not come up until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the impression of the Chair.

Mr. FRYE. My impression is that unanimous consent was asked that what is ordinarily termed the morning hour should expire at 1 o'clock instead of 2 o'clock. I have a recollection of that kind, but I may not be correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that that has not been the case at this session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better be done after to-day.

Mr. FRYE. I then will ask unanimous consent that what is ordinarily termed the morning hour shall close after to-day at 1 o'clock instead of 2.

Mr. HARRIS. During this session?

Mr. FRYE. During this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that request? The Chair hears none, and such will be the order. The Secretary will now report the first pension bill under the order just made by the Senate.

HENRY H. SIBLEY.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the Senate indefinitely postponed the bill (S. 1135) for the relief of Henry H. Sibley, which was reported from the Committee on Claims on the 16th of June, in order to have the bill put on the Calendar. I was not present when the report was made, or if I was it escaped my attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill indicated by him was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

The Senator from Alabama now desires the bill to be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee, which will be the order if there be no objection.

EMILY AGNEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 475) granting arrears of pension to Emily Agnel.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "directed," to insert "to readjudicate the pension claim of Emily Agnel, widow of Hyacinthe Robert Agnel, as if her application had been filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of July, 1880;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjudicate the pension claim of Emily Agnel, widow of Hyacinthe Robert Agnel, as if her application had been filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of July, 1880, and to pay, or cause to be paid, to the aforesaid Emily Agnel, a pension, at the rate prescribed by law, from the date of death of the said Hyacinthe Robert Agnel: Provided, That all sums previously paid on account of pension to the said Emily Agnel be deducted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the preamble.

The preamble of the bill was agreed to.

LUCY LE G. JEFFERS.

The bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is reported without recommendation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri suggests that the bill was reported without recommendation. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought this consideration was to include only favorable reports.

Mr. HARRISON. That was the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then this bill will be passed over. The Secretary will report the next.

MARY T. BARNES.

The bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary T. Barnes was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the same as the other, reported without recommendation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MARY HOPPERTON.

The bill (S. 1225) granting a pension to Mary Hopperton, widow of Edward Hopperton, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary Hopperton, widow of Edward Hopperton, at the rate of $8 per month from the date of his death.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 6, to change the name "Happerton" to "Hopperton" where it twice occurs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read. I see there is a majority and a minority report.

Mr. BLAIR. Is there not another amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has asked that the report be read. That will precede action on any amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. I see there is a minority report in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The views of the minority are here.

Mr. MAXEY. That indicates objection, and I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order was to take up those bills which the Committee on Pensions had recommended. The Secretary will proceed to read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. BLAIR May 19, 1884, and also the views of the minority of the committee, submitted by Mr. JACKSON, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1225) granting pension to Mary Hopperton, widow of Edward Hopperton, report the same favorably, with the recommendation that the same do pass. The facts in the case are as follows:

At the commencement of hostilities with Mexico, in 1845, Edward Hopperton, then the husband of the petitioner, was engaged in the manufacture of army wagons and ambulances at Cincinnati, Ohio, under contract with the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army. At the earnest solicitation of Capt. James R. Irwin, assistant quartermaster, United States Army, subsequently chief quartermaster of General Scott's army in Mexico, he left his home and his business and proceeded, with a number of mechanics, to Corpus Christi, Tex., to superintend the manufacture of the wagons preparatory to the march of the army of occupation.

When the army of General Scott sailed for Vera Cruz, Mr. Hopperton again yielded to Captain Irwin's earnest request to attend to a like important duty (for which he was unusually well qualified) in that army, and accompanied Capt. A. R. Hetzel, acting quartermaster, United States Army, in the capacity of master wheelwright, and is so borne on the rolls of that officer and the succeeding chief quartermasters of Vera Cruz from February 27, 1847, till the time of his death, August 20, 1847. He appears to have shared in the dangers of the bombardment of Vera Cruz, and the public records show that he must have rendered valuable services to the army in fitting up the vast trains of wagons and ambulances required to transport supplies and munitions of war and the sick and wounded soldiers on their march to the city of Mexico. During the campaign embracing the magnificent military operations which were initiated by the capture of Vera Cruz, and which culminated in the military occupation of the City of Mexico and such incalculable benefits to the United States, Mr. Hopperton remained at Vera Cruz in the discharge of his important duties at that place, which constituted the base of supplies to the army.

Every available soldier was at the front, and the Mexicans were continually threatening Vera Cruz and the line of march of the army. It therefore became necessary to impress the employés of the Government in the Quartermaster's Department. They were placed under military orders, discipline, and drill, and from time to time they were required to perform the active duties of a soldier. In this dual capacity Mr. Hopperton, with others, served the country under orders No. 2, Headquarters Department of Vera Cruz, dated May 7, 1847, up to and including the time of his death. The order under which he thus served the country was imperative in its terms, and required troops and all others to turn out in case of alarm. The service thus rendered would seem to have been compulsory.

The following affidavit of George Merritt, who was himself enrolled a master carpenter under Capt. A. R. Hetzel, and who was also captain of the company of mechanics in which Mr. Hopperton served, is before the committee. He says that he "knew the master wheelright (Mr. Hopperton) intimately, and all the master mechanics in the department. When the order was issued, in May, 1847, for all persons in Government employment to turn out under arms, the mechanics were all quartered in the convent of St. Augustine, of which I had charge, and thus became acquainted with all the men, about one hundred and fifty in number. * * * We were all mustered for mititary duty, armed and equipped for service, and turned out at every alarm. In fact we were at all times doubly employed as mechanics, &c., and doing garrison duty as soldiers under military authority, I acting as captain of the company of mechanics. I do further state that we were formed into a company before Vera Cruz was taken, and afterward in the city we had an armory, and an armorer by the name of Brown to take care of our arms, and we drilled every Saturday afternoon when not hurried with work."

Other evidence before the committee shows that this company, armed and mounted as rangers, accompanied a detachment of regular troops to the interior on an expedition organized to break up a camp of guerrillas which threatened the city and the communications with the interior.

While engaged in this double service, Mr. Hopperton died of yellow fever at Vera Cruz, August 20, 1847.

This double service seems to have been of an exacting character, and if service in the Quartermaster's Department, with an army of occupation in an enemy's country, could in any sense be called civil service, it is difficult to see how, when the same man rendered a civil service martial in its character, superadding to that compulsory subjection to all the demands and duties imposed on an enlisted man, and actually serving as such, can be said not to have been in the military service also. The logic of the conclusion of the minority committee goes to this length: That if a man renders service to the country in both a civil and a military capacity, he therefore renders service in neither a military nor a civil capacity.

The truth is that Mr. Hopperton rendered double service and in both capacities. Certainly, if he was a volunteer in the Quartermaster's Department he was not a volunteer in the sense that he could escape the obligation of service therein at will, and if his service in the Quartermaster's Department was voluntary his impressment into garrison duty, whereby he saved the Government the service of an enlisted man, and in the performance of which he lost his life, can be no ground for denying to his widow that equitable relief which the Government would have owed him without doubt had he been an enlisted man and nothing else.

Mr. Hopperton appears to have been a man of property and large business capacity, who assumed the performance of duties far below his actual capacity at the earnest solicitation of the officers of the Government, and from the most patriotic motives. In so doing he destroyed his business, sacrificed his property, and lost his life. His widow is aged and penniless, and is alone, without means of support.

Very few men contributed more largely than her husband to our success in the Mexican war, and to our enormous accretions of territory, population, wealth, and glory which have resulted from it.

Besides his service and his life, he seems to have contributed directly to the Government a considerable amount of property, for which his widow made claim, but which has been disallowed.

The petitioner asks pension from the death of her husband, but, mindful of the temper of Congress, which is to deny arrears of pensions in most cases, and being anxious that partial justice be done to the claimant, we recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, granting to her pension at the rate of $8 per month from and after its passage, the bill being amended accordingly.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following views of the minority:

The undersigned, not concurring in the report of the majority of the Committee on Pensions on bill S. 1225, respectfully submit the following as their views:

This case was fully considered during the Forty-fifth Congress, was adversely reported, and the report adopted by the Senate. It was again before Congress at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, was again examined by the committee, and again reported adversely. This last report (No. 437) correctly sets forth the facts on which the application is rested, and the grounds of its rejection, and is here adopted, as follows:

"Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Hopperton for a pension, having examined the same, report:

"The petitioner applied by petition to the Forty-fifth Congress for a pension, and the Committee on Pensions reported as follows:

"'That the petitioner alleges that she is the widow of Edward Hopperton, who, at the earnest solicitation of Capt. James R. Irwin, General Scott's chief quartermaster in Mexico, left his business at Cincinnati, went to Corpus Christi, Tex., to build wagons and ambulances for the army of occupation, and subsequently left with said army in the employ thereof as master wheelwright, and continued in said last-named service from February 27, 1847, till the 20th of August of the same year; also that he bore arms as a volunteer under orders No. 2, Headquarters Department of Vera Cruz, dated 8th May, 1847, which directed the troops and all others so required to turn out under arms in case of alarm.

"'The records of the Quartermaster-General's office show that Edward Hopperton was employed, as alleged, as master wheelwright for the period named, at $60 per month, and that he died at Vera Cruz August 20, 1847.

"'Evidence of petitioner's marriage to deceased is produced.

"'The petitioner prays relief at the rate of $8 per month from August 20, 1847, to the date of granting said relief.

"'The Commissioner of Pensions reports that claim for pension was rejected in 1849, as there is no provision of law granting her a pension.

"'There is no doubt this man died of disease contracted while in the service of the United States, but the service in which he was engaged was civil and not military. He may on a single occasion have rendered, as a volunteer, some military service, but there is not any pretense that the disease of which he died was contracted on that occasion.

"'The committee recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.'

"The report was adopted by the Senate, and since that time the petitioner has filed some additional evidence in support of her claim for a pension, but the additional evidence does not prove that he contracted the disease of which he died in the military service. Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mary Hopperton for pension."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is another amendment reported by the committee, the Chair is informed. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 8, after the word "from," the committee report to strike out "date of his death" and insert "passage of this act;" so as to read:

And pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month from the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mary Hopperton, widow of Edward Hopperton."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk calls the attention of the Chair to what is evidently an error, that the enacting clause of the bill begins with the word "Resolved." If there be no objection it will be changed so as to make it a bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. That would involve the necessity of sending the bill back to the House, as it is a House bill. I should like to know whether in its present form it would not be effective. I think it would be considered to be a joint resolution which would be equivalent to a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not familiar with the precedents in such a case. The title of the bill reads, "An act granting a pension to Nancy Ellis," while the enacting clause reads, "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

Mr. MITCHELL. It is in the usual form of a joint resolution, and I suppose the title would be sufficient. I think there would be no danger about the construction of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be necessary then to change the title so as to read, "A joint resolution granting a pension to Nancy Ellis."

Mr. COCKRELL. To avoid any amendments let it go as it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the House would concur without delay. It is a mere formal amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I move to amend so as to make it in the usual form of enactment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The usual enacting clause will be prefixed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order of Business 729 is a House bill on the same subject.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that action be had upon the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves to indefinitely postpone the Senate bill.

Mr. PLATT. Let it be laid aside informally until the House bill is read and acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that course will be taken.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6171) granting pension to Noah E. Smith, have considered the same, and report the same favorably, with an amendment, and as amended recommend its passage.

The committee report the following amendment to the bill: Strike out the words "seventy-five dollars" in the bill, and insert instead thereof the words "fifty dollars."

We append the House report, and also certain letters and documents supporting the claim of Mr. Smith.

The Committee on Pensions, having had under consideration a bill to grant a pension to Noah E. Smith, beg leave to make the following report:

Noah E. Smith, a citizen of the State of New Hampshire, is now seventy-six years old, and very infirm and poor. At the time of the war with Mexico he was a citizen of the United States doing a large and prosperous business, and possessed of a fine fortune in the City of Mexico, consisting of property. He had been in the City of Mexico twenty years, and had for years superintended a stage line from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, including several branch lines, and had gained a thorough knowledge of the country over which General Scott's army had to pass. He had fully mastered the language, and knew all the habits and customs of the people. When American prisoners from General Taylor's line were carried to the City of Mexico he used his influence to have them released from a filthy prison and given the privilege of the bounds of the city, and furnished them money to support them decently. After General Scott started from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, General Lombardine, commander of the military forces of the City of Mexico, had Smith and other American citizens expelled from the city.

Smith took refuge in the house of Sir Edward Thornton, the English minister, for ten days, and escaped by night in disguise, carrying important dispatches to General Scott, whom he reached at Pueblo; and General Scott, learning of Smith's good character, good sense, and thorough knowledge of the Mexican language and of the Mexican people and country, invited him to become an honorary member of his staff, which position he accepted, and was General Scott's guide and interpreter from that time until he entered the City of Mexico; and rode by his side, only when sent for supplies, and when detached with the engineers for the purpose of reconnoitering, and on that duty, with Capt. Robert E. Lee, P. G. T. Beauregard, and others, he was of great service. Reaching the city, General Scott gave him the command of fifty dragoons, and he led General Scott into the City of Mexico. He has never received any compensation for his services, and lost all his property in the City of Mexico. General Beauregard, Cassius M. Clay, Captain Smith, and Captain Heady all send letters bearing testimony to his great service to his country and to the American prisoners. Wherefore your committee report the bill favorably, and recommend that Noah E. Smith be placed on the pension-roll at the rate of $75 per month from and after the passage of this bill, during the remainder of his life.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, a citizen of Laconia, in the State of New Hampshire, respectfully represents that he is 76 years old, and has always lived in New Hampshire, with the exception of twenty years. At the outbreak of the Mexican war he had been a resident of the City of Mexico for fifteen years, and was then keeping a large livery and boarding stable, sufficient to accommodate 1,000 horses, and in connection therewith was doing an extensive business in buying and selling horses upon commission; that the net profits from his business were $10,000 per annum by estimate; that prior to engaging in this line of business your petitioner was superintendent of a stage line, extending from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, and including several branch lines, in which position he gained a thorough knowledge of the country, its customs, and language; that in a few months after the war began your petitioner, with all other American citizens residing there, was expelled from the city by general order of the commander-in-chief of the military forces of the city, General Lombardine, and compelled to abandon all his business and property on forty-eight hours' notice, or sell it for what he could get; that upon publication of said order your petitioner immediately took refuge in the house of the English minister for a few days. Here he received from Sir Edward Thornton important dispatches, to be delivered to General Scott in person; that your petitioner, disguised, accompanied by his servant and guide, left the house of the English minister and escaped from the city by night, and in forty-eight hours reached Pueblo, the headquarters of General Scott, and was immediately introduced to him, and delivered the dispatches; that General Scott, after learning of your petitioner's knowledge of the country, the customs of the people, and their language, immediately invited him to become an honorary member of his staff, which position your petitioner accepted.

From that time until the capture of the City of Mexico your petitioner acted as General Scott's guide and interpreter, rode by his side, and was never from him an hour at a time, night or day, except when detached with the engineers for purposes of reconnoitering, or with a convoy for procuring supplies; that when the United States Army entered the city, in compliance with an order from General Scott, your petitioner took fifty dragoons and led the General and his forces into the city by way of San Cosme gate, keeping fifty paces in advance and measuring his distance well; that your petitioner has never received any compensation for his services while with the army, or for the personal expenses of himself and servant, or from losses arising from destruction of business and property occasioned by his expulsion from the city.

Wherefore your petitioner prays that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place his name on the pension-rolls at such sum per month during his natural life as Congress may determine.

NOAH E. SMITH.

NOVEMBER 14, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I have received your second letter about Noah E. Smith, esq., who indeed rendered such important services to the American prisoners of war in the City of Mexico. Colonel Smith was no doubt a bold, generous, and patriotic gentleman, and risked all property and life for our cause, and deserves well of his country, and should have a pension by all means from the United States. Since you mention his deeds more particularly I recall and identify him, and will do anything I can that is honorable to commend him to the good offices of Congress and the National Government. Please give my kind regards to the Colonel, and believe me,

Truly yours,

C. M. CLAY.

Col. T. J. WHIPPLE, Laconia.

LOUISVILLE, KY., February 12, 1883.

DEAR FRIEND: I have just received your letter and one to Capt. George P. Smith, which I forwarded to him to Pendleton Station P. O., Henry County, Kentucky, where he lives. It has been a long time, but my recollections of you and your conduct are hallowed by pleasing, grateful memories of your kindness to the Encarnacion prisoners at the City of Mexico, in 1847. I well recollect that your sudden expulsion from the city was upon an order from the war department to leave within twenty-four hours; that you left your family, wife and children, your livery stable—a large one well stocked with horses, carriages, and other property suitable to that business; that you came back to the city with the army commanded by General Scott. I was not with you on the march from Pueblo to the capital, but my information was that after your expulsion and joining Scott at Pueblo that you acted as his guide and interpreter, and that your employment in these capacities was continued long after our departure (the Encarnacion prisoners) from the city on the 1st November, 1847—perhaps to the close of the war. I recollect your calling to see me at Louisville the next spring—I think, about the latter part of May, about the time peace was made—on your way to join your children in the East, your wife having died crossing the Gulf; that you told me your connection in the Government service had recently terminated. You loaned us money, clothed us when we were in rags, and fed us when we were hungry. Your devotion and loyalty to the United States Government, its cause, officers, and soldiers was of the highest character, and Congress should unhesitatingly indemnify all your losses and richly compensate your valuable services.

Yours, truly,

WM. J. HEADY.

Mr. NOAH E. SMITH, Laconia, N. H.

PENDLETON, KY., February 25, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 4th instant did not reach me until Saturday, 23d, and now I reply, hoping what I have to say may be of service to you in whatever effort you may make for remuneration for your large services rendered General Scott and the army under him during his occupancy of the City of Mexico. To begin with, I have a perfect recollection of you and your untiring efforts to relieve the suffering of myself and other fellow-prisoners while incarcerated in the St. Jago prison or near the City of Mexico. It was doubtless through your instrumentality that the prisoners were placed on parole after several months of prison life in the loathsome prison above named. It was you more than any American citizen then resident of the City of Mexico that contributed in having us placed on parole, and then having the entire liberty of the city, to walk the streets of the same without molestation, and to have our prison life changed to one of the best hotels of the city.

I feel, sir, that it was you and through you that this change in our favor was brought about, and that but for your efforts for the amelioration of our suffering in prison we might have remained there till released by General Scott and his army on their entrance into the city. We were allowed for our support, I think, $3 per week by those who had control of us, a sum far below the amount necessary for an economical support. This deficiency was readily and cheerfully supplied by your liberal hand.

How often, when you were looking after your daily business, did the paroled prisoners bless Noah Smith for his manifest interest in our behalf, you will never know. Without limit your purse was ever open to extend such relief as our real or imaginary wants suggested. Those many acts of your kindness to me, now stricken in years, I can never, never forget. I have sat at your table and have partaken of your hospitalities, and when leaving the City of Mexico, the 1st of November, 1847, so fearful were you that your wife would meet with insult and abuse from the Mexicans after the withdrawal of our army, you intrusted her to our care to visit her native State; but, sad to think of it now, at these long intervening years, she died before reaching New Orleans, and the ex-prisoners, I reckon without an exception, followed her remains to their place of interment in that city.

Many times have I, with other prisoners, sat at your livery stable, at or near San Augustine convent, and there talked about your business, which seemed, before the taking of the city by the American Army, to be in a very prosperous condition. I learned while there, not from you but from others, that you had amassed a good fortune, and I know it was so regarded by all of my fellow-prisoners. I know and I shall never forget the order banishing you from the city of Mexico, and what consternation was produced in the hearts and minds of resident Americans; but a fear for the safety of helpless prisoners pervaded the minds of all people of other countries then in the city. I would undertake to say that the services you rendered General Scott as guide, interpreter, &c., could not be reckoned or estimated by dollars and cents, and while Congress, thus far, has failed to vote a dollar toward the support of Mexican veterans in their declining years, I trust they will take up your case and act upon it without delay and gladden your heart by making such liberal allowances as will secure to you and yours a competency for the remainder of your years here on earth.

Sincerely, your friend,

GEORGE T. SMITH,
Late Captain and Assistant Quartermaster, United States Army.

NOAH E. SMITH, Laconia, N. H.

P. S.—I am now in my seventy-second year, with a broken hip from a fall on the ice four years ago. I go on crutches, and am not in very good health. Do write to me and tell me all about yourself.

S.

NEW ORLEANS, April 20, 1883.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 15th instant has been received. I remember you well, and your valuable services in Mexico during the year 1847. You joined us at Pueblo, in August or September of that year, just before our march to the valley of M. You were at once attached to General Scott's staff as interpreter and guide, and by your thorough knowledge of the country and its language you were of great service to the Corps of Engineers in procuring a map of the City of Mexico, and giving such information as we needed to facilitate our advance. You were noted also for your courage and zeal. While in that city, before joining us, you were of assistance to the American prisoners there, and you were instrumental, we were afterward informed, in getting some of our officers in the city paroled by the Mexican authorities.

In conclusion, I know no one in civil life who took a part in that campaign better entitled to the kind consideration of the United States Government.

I am, yours, very truly,

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

Mr. NOAH E. SMITH,
Laconia. N. H.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill as it passed the House gives this old gentleman, the guide of the American army from Vera Cruz to the capital of Mexico in the Mexican war, a pension at the rate of $75 per month. The Senate committee reported the bill with an amendment reducing it to $50 a month. Since the report was made I have had a conversation with my colleague [Mr. PIKE], who can in a moment state the matter more fully in regard to the physical condition of this old gentleman. It seems that he is now in such a state of health that there is no encouragement to hope that he will live more than a very short time. Probably he can hardly survive a year, and if he is to receive so small a pittance as a pension of $50 for a month or such a matter, it will be of no substantial assistance to him.

Of the great service which he rendered to the country there can be no question. I presume if they were present there are probably members of the Senate who remember Mr. Smith. He was a particular personal friend of ex-President Pierce. It is a matter of common notoriety, at least it has been in our State for a long time, that his services were considered invaluable to the army. In fact his local knowledge of the city was the means by which the plans of the Engineer Corps which had been erroneously drawn were corrected in such a way that the final assault upon the Mexican capital was successful.

His losses were very large. He lost his wife as well as his fortune during and in consequence of his connection with the war. I think if the committee had known the facts more thoroughly in regard to his present condition, his great poverty and his excellent desert, the bill would have been reported without question as it came from the House. I hope the amendment will be disagreed to and that the bill will pass as it came from the House, giving him a pension of $75 a month.

Mr. PIKE. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I do not as a rule believe it to be wise to antagonize the report of a committee, but I think if the committee had known about this case as well as I know of it they would not have proposed to amend the bill as it came from the House but would have agreed to give this man a pension of $75 per month. He is a very old, infirm man. He had a prosperous business and a large estate in the City of Mexico. When General Scott went there he was ordered to leave the city. He escaped in the night and became an honorary member of General Scott's staff and led his victorious army into the city, and I believe did more than any other single man to make our arms triumphant there.

He is now almost 80 years old. He asked nothing from the Government until his property was all gone, and now he must either go to the poor-house or live on the charity of friends, or else receive something from the Government to sustain him during the rest of his life. I think it is a very meritorious case. He is a toppling old man, who must have somebody to take care of him personally, and it would be wrong to diminish the amount granted him by the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THERESA CROSBY WATSON.

The bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson was announced as the next pension bill in order on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. That is one of a class of cases that may lead to discussion, and it may be passed over if there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over.

Mr. FAIR. I was in hopes that that bill would pass as it came from the House, granting a pension of $50 per month. I knew Captain Watson well. His people are very poor. This pension is all they will have to live upon. The committee propose to reduce the pension from $50 to $30 per month. I think the bill should be considered.

Mr. BLAIR. It is a case which unquestionably would pass without opposition at $30 a month; but it is one of the strongest cases I know on or off the pension-roll where the ordinary increase granted to the widow of an officer of high rank should be to $50 per month. The bill passed the House at that rate. The Senate committee have amended the bill as it came from the House by reducing the pension to $30 a month. The question involved in the amendment is whether there shall be a reduction from the amount fixed by the House. If it is thought best to take the bill up at the present time I have no objection. I am myself in favor of the passage of the bill as it came from the House. Others oppose it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. CALL. I hope there will be no objection to the substitution of the proposition of the House for the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw my objection, as Senators seem inclined to go on with the bill, but I reserve the right to renew the objection.

Mr. CALL. Does the Senator from New Hampshire object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not object if the friends of the applicant are inclined to go on with the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to reserve the right to object if necessary.

Mr. CALL. I do not desire to interpose in the matter if the Senator from New Hampshire thinks it better that the bill should not come up at this time. I leave the matter with him.

Mr. BLAIR. As I said before, it is one of a class of cases, and it occurred to me that there might be Senators who wish to be heard on it, who may not have been aware that the bill would come up to-day. It would involve considerable discussion, and I think it would be a fairer thing to everybody that the case should be passed over at the present time.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will inquire how many similar cases are on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know the precise number, but there are probably six or eight in all, but not of this highest rank. There are others involving the question of an increase, but of a lower rank.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator had better agree to fix the pension at $30.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that there is no trouble about giving a pension of $30. There is no controversy over $30.

Mr. WILSON. Let it go through at $30.

Mr. BLAIR. No; I object to that. I think the case had better be passed over for the present.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall object to the consideration of the case now in order to save time.

Mr. BLAIR. However, I give notice that I shall call the bill up at an early time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, and the next pension bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "pension-roll," to strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. VAN WYCK. The proposition of the committee was that those words should be stricken out where they occur and be inserted at the end of the bill. I move the amendment in that form.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The committee also report to fill the blank by inserting the letter "F;" so as to read "Company F."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill be informally laid aside until we conclude the call of the pension cases.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. KENNA. I understand we have now passed the last of the pension bills. I ask leave to take from the Calendar House bill 1628.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be informally laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1628) authorizing and directing the sale of the real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at Harper's Ferry, in the State of West Virginia. Is there objection?

The Chief Clerk read the bill:

Mr. INGALLS. From what committee of the Senate is the bill reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAXEY. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a printed report? If so, let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary will read the report.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, as I made the report, I think I can state in a much shorter time than the reading will occupy all the points in it.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. MAXEY June 24, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1628) authorizing and directing the sale of the real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at Harper's Ferry, in the State of West Virginia, respectfully submit the following report:

Attention is called to the communication of the Solicitor of the Treasury, addressed to Hon. S. M. STOCKSLAGER, of the House of Representatives, herewith, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1884.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, inclosing House bill 1628, authorizing the sale of United States property at Harper's Ferry, and requesting me to make any recommendation in reference to the matter.

The property mentioned in the bill consists mainly of the water-powers of the Potomac and Shenandoah Rivers at that place, formerly used for the manufacture by the United States of ordnance material for the Army. Its chief and perhaps only value consists in the water-power of the two rivers, and the machinery, water-wheels, masonry, and building material on the ground. By sections 3749, 3750, Revised Statutes, and by act of Congress of June 14, 1878 (20 Stats. at L., sec. 130), the care and sale of this property devolves on the Solicitor of the Treasury.

Under the sections of the Revised Statutes aforesaid, in the character of property acquired through judicial process in the payment of debt, a sale is subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The difficulty has been in estimating the actual value of the water-power privileges, or in fixing some limit as a minimum to prevent sacrifice. In the year 1869 the War Department offered the two properties at public auction, and the same were bid off and sold on a credit of two years for $206,000. This was manifestly a fabulous price. However, not a dollar of the purchase-money was ever paid, and on a foreclosure of the lien in 1876 the United States, by the Solicitor of the Treasury, bid the property in for the payment of the debt upon it at $70,000.

Since then an offer of $15,000 has been made or guaranteed as a bid in case of advertisement for sale. I think the property should be sold at any reasonable sum. It is rapidly deteriorating in its material and capabilities, and besides, in this region of the country, water-power, as compared with steam, is of much less value for obvious reasons than in former years.

The value of the property in question has no doubt been exaggerated very greatly in the minds of the Government officers who have had charge of it. It has been well advertised over the country, and there has been little or nothing to convince me that it would attract any general attention at an auction sale. The best and perhaps the only test of its value is the sum it will realize by competitive bidding after extended notice of the sale.

In regard to the bill which has been prepared, I would say that I am inclined to favor that feature thereof which makes the offer to sell imperative; and yet there should be some limit or guard that the property may not be unduly sacrificed.

I would suggest that the bill be amended so as to authorize and direct a sale at a price not less than $15,000 for the two water-power tracts.

Very respectfully,

K. RAYNER,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

Hon. S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Chairman House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The committee adopt the House of Representatives report on the bill, as follows:

"The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1628) authorizing and directing the sale of the real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at Harper's Ferry, in the State of West Virginia, having had the same under consideration, report it to the House with the recommendation that it pass. The buildings formerly used as workshops, armory, and arsenal at Harper's Ferry having been destroyed during the war, the Government abandoned the property for public uses, and Congress having obtained the opinion of the Attorney-General that the United States had a fee-simple title to the same, passed an act December 15, 1868, directing the Secretary of War to make sale at public auction of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at or near Harper's Ferry. In pursuance of this authority the Secretary of War sold said property on November 30, and December 1 and 2, 1869, consisting (1) of the water-power and grounds on which the arsenal, armories, and factories formerly stood; (2) an ore bank; (3) a ferry privilege; (4) a large number of lots. The total amount bid for said property was $297,803.50, of which the water-power and the property connected therewith brought $206,000. The sale was upon credit, and it eventually appeared that the chief item, the water-power, was bid in by a company of irresponsible speculators, who took no steps toward using or improving the property, and defaulted in the payment of their bonds.

"After several years' delay, during which a disastrous flood reduced its value, and that value otherwise steadily depreciated, the Government was unable to collect anything on the bonds and was compelled to enforce its vendor's lien, and bought back said property at a mere fraction of the original price. Moreover, the two hundred and forty lots sold to private individuals for the aggregate of $73,303.50 had been bought on the faith of the improvement of the water-power and consequent restoration of some measure of prosperity to the town. This having failed, the purchasers, who were generally the poor people of the vicinage, were, except in a few cases, unable to comply with the terms of purchase, and Congress finally came to their relief by act passed June 14, 1878, authorizing the Solicitor of the Treasury to cancel their contracts and release the purchasers. Thus, after ten years, the Government became again seized of almost all the property it had sold, greatly diminished in value.

"The same act authorized the Solicitor to resell the whole or any part of said property or to lease the same for a term of years. Any effort to sell under this authority is greatly hampered by the fact that the value of the property has become so shrunken and speculative that as long as the sale remains in the discretion of any officer, it imposes an embarrassing responsibility upon him to judge whether the price is really an advantageous one. The object of the present bill is to effect an early sale of the property and relieve from any such embarrassment, by making the order for sale peremptory in case a minimum limit is reached, and at the same time providing that it shall only be made at public auction, after full and fair advertising, and at open competition. This is at once for the interest of the United States and of the locality itself, where recuperation and prosperity are totally repressed by the continued disuse and desolation of this property.

"The Government is incurring expense by holding on to property which it declines to use for any purpose, while its value is steadily diminishing upon its hands. It is also a matter of sheer justice to the State of West Virginia and to the particular locality that this large area of property in the very heart of the village of Harper's Ferry, abandoned and in ruins, exempt from taxation, and by its very abandonment repressing all prosperity and almost destroying the value of contiguous private property, should be as soon as possible transferred to ownership which will improve it, develop its capabilities, and subject it to its equitable share of local burdens.

"Moreover, your committee deem it equally impolitic and unjust for the Government, after ceasing to use property for the public purposes for which it was acquired, to become a lessor thereof to private individuals for the erection of works which would be tax-free. The Legislature of West Virginia has passed a joint resolution asking for the sale of this property.

"Your committee, therefore, looking to the interest of the Government and to the rights of the State wherein the property is located, recommend the passage of this bill, with the following amendments:

"In section 1, line 7 of printed bill, after the word 'reservation,' insert the words 'except as hereinafter provided.'

"Add to section 1 the following proviso: 'Provided, That the property shall not be sold for a less sum than $20,000.'

"Add to section 2 the words 'but so that at least one-third of the purchase-money shall be paid in cash, and the credit portion shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.'

"Insert in the bill as section 3 the following:

"'SEC. 3. That upon the compliance of any purchaser or purchasers of the whole or of any parcel, purchased as aforesaid, with the terms of sale, such purchaser or purchasers shall be let into possession of the premises so purchased; and upon full payment of the purchase-money, and interest (if any be due), the Solicitor of the Treasury, for and in behalf of the United States, shall make, seal, and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers good and sufficient deed or deeds, conveying all the right, title, interest, and estate of the United States in the said property, or parcel thereof, as the case may be, in fee-simple.'

"Insert section 3 of the original bill as section 4.

"The committee are of opinion that there is no reasonable probability that this property will ever again be used for governmental purposes, in which case it is best that it pass into private hands upon just compensation, in order that it may be used for productive purposes. It seems but just that, if not intended to be used by the Government, it is but fair that it should be subjected to taxes like other property in West Virginia."

The bill appears to be well guarded; wherefore the committee report the said bill without amendment, and recommend that the same do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. A few days ago the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations was returned from the House with sundry amendments and was laid upon the table. I ask now that it be taken up and that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments made by the House of Representatives and ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the presiding officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. LOGAN, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. DOLPH submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Amendments were submitted by Mr. HARRISON, Mr. PIKE, Mr. GARLAND, Mr. BLAIR, Mr. GROOME, Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, Mr. DAWES, Mr. VOORHEES, Mr. RANSOM, and Mr. INGALLS, intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. LAPHAM, it was Ordered, That B. J. O'Driscoll have leave to withdraw his petition for pension, and other papers accompanying the same, from the files of the Senate, in accordance with the rules of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate now the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Kansas to let this bill be temporarily laid aside in order that we may proceed with the consideration of such pension cases as have been adversely reported. There are some meritorious cases, and certainly there is no reason why a pensioner who has a good case should not have it acted on by the Senate because the committee has reported adversely.

Mr. INGALLS. Some pension bills favorably reported were laid over, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There were some bills reported without recommendation which were passed over under the rule adopted this morning.

Mr. BLAIR. There are several which were reported favorably with amendments, and I think that those ought certainly to be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senatemay proceed to the consideration of the pension bills on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall have to object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state to the Senator from Florida that I am interested myself in a number of pension cases which have been reported adversely, and I was in hopes that the other pension cases might have been disposed of a little earlier so that they might be taken up; but I am advised that there will be other pension cases to be taken up before the Senate will adjourn, and I hope the Senate will agree to take up all the pension cases, both those reported favorably and those reported unfavorably, at some opportune time, and that then the cases in which the Senator from Florida is interested, as well as those I am interested in, may be considered. I think that will answer his purpose. I do not believe at this time I can yield any further.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask my colleague to allow me to make a motion for the purpose of perfecting the Journal, and that is that Senate bill 908, Order of Business 164, may be indefinitely postponed, a House bill on the same subject having been passed this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the bill (S. 908) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HALE. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, with sundry amendments and a report. I ask that the report be printed, and I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill tomorrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be printed, and the bill will go upon the Calendar.

THERESA CROSBY WATSON.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like, in one of the pension cases that has been passed over, Order of Business 764, to know the entry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The chair does not understand the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to know what order has been entered in relation to the bill (H. R. 103) granting a pension to Theresa Crosby Watson, which has been passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was objected to, and went over.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like it passed over without detriment, without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It holds its place on the Calendar, of course.

Mr. BLAIR. It does not go over to the Calendar under the ninth rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course not; it holds its place on the Calendar.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to present a conference report at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

"SEC. 2. That sections 4768, 4769, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes are hereby made applicable also to all cases hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions, and to all cases so filed since June 20, 1878, and which have not been heretofore allowed, except as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 3. That section 4785 of the Revised Statutes is hereby re-enacted and amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 4785. No agent or attorney or other person shall demand or receive any other compensation for his services in prosecuting a claim for pension or bounty land than such as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct to be paid to him, not exceeding $25; nor shall such agent, attorney, or other person demand or receive such compensation, in whole or in part, until such pension or bounty-land claim shall be allowed: Provided, That in all claims allowed since June 20, 1878, where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that the fee of $10, or any part thereof, has not been paid, he shall cause the same to be deducted from the pension, and the pension agent to pay the same to the recognized attorney.'

In all cases where application is made for pension or bounty-land, and no agreement is filed with the Commissioner as herein provided, the fee shall be $10, and no more. RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments and submit a report thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the report of the committee.

AMENDMENT TO THE SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BOWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in section 1, line 24, after the word "stations," to insert:

Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

Mr. MORGAN. I have an amendment to the first section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). Is it an amendment to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. MORGAN. My amendment is to strike out this amendment and part of the text of the bill and substitute other matter.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama to permit the committee amendment to be acted on; he can then offer his amendment and it will not disturb the harmony of the bill as reported by the committee if it should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the amendment of the Senator from Alabama propose to amend the part of the text of the bill which the committee propose to strike out?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then it is now in order, and it could not be received after action on the committee amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

Mr. MORGAN. I send it to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 17, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "forfeited," as follows:

And the title thereto resumed by the United States, and said lands restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made; but nothing in this act shall be construed to recognize the right of said company to any land in the Indian Territory, or claim thereto, on condition or otherwise, except the right of way and land for stations.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri to hear and determine all questions and controversies concerning the rights and equities in said forfeited lands that are claimed or asserted by the United States, or by any person or corporation claiming the same under or in consequence of any laws of the United States, or any act of its lawfully authorized agents, and to enforce any judgment or decree, either interlocutory or final, that said court shall render in respect of said lands or any interest therein.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the western district of Missouri, under the direction of the Department of Justice, to proceed in the circuit court of the United States for the said district, by bill in equity in the name of the United States of America as plaintiff, against any corporations or persons that claim any interest in the lands hereby declared forfeited arising under said act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, or under this act, so as to bring before said court for its determination the validity of such claim, whether the same be legal or equitable.

SEC. 4. Any person or corporation not made a party defendant in said proceeding, but claiming any interest under the laws of the United States in the lands or any part thereof which are declared forfeited by this act, may present such claim by petition in said cause, duly verified by oath, and if the court, upon consideration thereof, shall decide that the adjudication and settlement of such claim is necessary to do complete justice in such cause, the court shall direct that such further proceedings be had upon such petition as that the same may be fully heard and determined, and shall proceed to decree upon the same as fully as if such petitioner had been made a party defendant in said suit: Provided, That no such petition shall be filed after twelve months from the date of the filing of the bill in said cause.

SEC. 5. The court shall, if it see fit, tax all the costs of the suit under the third section of this act against the United States, and shall apportion the cost of any proceeding under the fourth section of this act between the parties according to justice and equity. Any party to the suit instituted under this act shall have the right of appeal from any final decree therein to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same conditions as are prescribed by law and the rules of said court for appeals in equity cases. And the Supreme Court shall cause said appeal to be advanced on the docket so that the same shall be speedily determined. But no right of appeal shall exist after six months from the time when said final decree is entered on the records of the circuit court of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I do not design to consume the time of the Senate in a discussion of this bill at any great length, but I shall make a statement of the facts of the case and of the views which the committee took of the bill in order that the theory of the case which has been observed by the committee in reporting the bill may be before the Senate.

This Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company was chartered by an act of Congress of July 27, 1866, for the purpose of building a railroad from Springfield, Mo., to the Pacific Ocean. To aid in the building of the railroad Congress granted to it not only the right of way across the public domain to the extent of one hundred feet in width and the right to take materials for construction off the adjacent public land, but granted to it as well—

Every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile, on each side of said railroad line, as said company may adopt, through the Territories of the United States, and ten alternate sections of land per mile on each side of said railroad whenever it passes through any State, and whenever, on the line thereof, the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from pre-emption or other claims or rights, at the time the line of said road is designated by a plat thereof, filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office."

The line of road from Springfield, Mo., to San Francisco, the terminal point now claimed by the company, is about 1,800 miles. It may be 1,900 miles, according to the line which would be ordinarily followed in the construction of the road. It is sixty-six miles in the State of Missouri, and about four hundred miles in the State of California. The remaining portion of the line is in the Indian Territory and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

The total amount of lands, provided the grant should be full—that is, provided there are public lands along the line of the railroad sufficient to satisfy the grant according to the terms—would be about 50,000,000 acres. Up to three years ago the company had constructed the line from Springfield, Mo., to Vinita, in the Indian Territory, a point on the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad. Since that time it has constructed from Vinita southwesterly to Tulsa, on the Arkansas River, some fifty or sixty miles, and has also completed in the neighborhood of six hundred miles from Albuquerque, on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, in the Territory of New Mexico, to a place called the Needles, in California, on the line between California and Arizona, and a point on the Southern Pacific Railroad in California. It has had certified to it by reason of such construction about a million acres of land.

The bill does not propose to take from the railroad company any land affirmatively which it has earned, to use that term in its ordinary signification, by reason of the building of any mile of its railroad, but it simply proposes to take from it the lands which it has not earned—that is to say, the lands opposite the uncompleted portions of its line. According to the terms of the grant it was required—

That the said company shall commence the work on said road within two years from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete not less than fifty miles per year after the second year, and shall construct, equip, furnish, and complete the main line of the whole road by the 4th day of July, A. D. 1878.

No portion of this road was completed except that portion from Springfield to Vinita, in the Indian Territory, prior to the 4th day of July, 1878, the date named at the expiration of which the railroad should have been completed from Springfield to the Pacific Ocean. All the road which has been constructed since that date has been since the time when by its terms the grant was subject to forfeiture, that being so much of the line as lies between Vinita, in the Indian Territory, and Tulsa, on the Arkansas River, in the Indian Territory, and that portion of the line between Albuquerque and the Needles, amounting, as I said, to about six hundred and forty miles in length. The remaining portion of the line, amounting to some twelve or thirteen hundred miles, not only has not been completed, but practically the road has not been definitely located over any portion of that line and no work has been done upon it of any kind or description whatever.

It was provided also that the road should be built to the Pacific Ocean upon the most practicable route, but by some means the company determined to build to San Francisco, although that was not the nearest practicable point on the Pacific Ocean which could have been reached by the construction of the railroad. It secured the withdrawal of land along the line in California from the point at which the road was to enter the State to San Francisco, upon the theory that that was the nearest practicable point upon the Pacific Ocean to be reached by the construction of the road. I do not think there can be any question that that withdrawal was practically in violation of the terms of the act, and that the company was required to build its line across the State of California to the nearest harbor upon the Pacific coast which could be reached by the construction of a line not, at least, unusually expensive.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, in order to get the record exactly right about this matter, I will read from that part of the act which locates the route:

> Beginning at or near the town of Springfield, in the State of Missouri, thence to the western boundary line of said State, and thence by the most eligible railroad route, as shall be determined by said company, to a point on the Canadian River; thence to the town of Albuquerque, on the River Del Norte, and thence by way of the Agua Frio, or other suitable pass, to the headwaters of the Colorado Chiquito, and thence along the thirty-fifth parallel of latitude, as near as may be found most suitable for a railway route, to the Colorado River at such point as may be selected by said company for crossing; thence by the most practicable and eligible route to the Pacific.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, I was looking for that portion of the statute which the Senator from Alabama has read. The design was apparently to have a road constructed substantially upon the thirty-fifth parallel. San Francisco is nearly two hundred miles north of that parallel. It is on the thirty-eighth parallel. But by some hocus-pocus the land was withdrawn in such a way as to permit the railroad company, if it could thereby acquire the right, to built to San Francisco and have a grant for the entire land to that place. To built it directly to the Pacific in place of building it to San Francisco would shorten the line at least one hundred and fifty miles.

In 1871, by the act of April 20 of that year, Congress passed an act authorizing the Atlantic and Pacific Company to mortgage its road. Under that act the company was authorized—

> To make and issue its bonds in such form and manner, for such sums, payable at such times, and bearing such rate of interest, and to dispose of them on such terms as its directors may deem advisable; and to secure said bonds the said company may mortgage its road, equipment, lands, franchises, privileges, and other rights and property, subject to such terms, conditions, and limitations as its directors may prescribe. As proof and notice of the legal execution and effectual delivery of any mortgage hereafter made by said company, it shall be filed and recorded in the office of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That if the company shall hereafter suffer any breach of the conditions of the act referred to, under which it is organized, the rights of those claiming, under any mortgage made by the company to the lands granted to it by said act, shall extend only to so much thereof as shall be conterminous with or appertain to that part of said road which shall have been constructed at the time of the foreclosure of said mortgage.

From the language of that subsequent act the company draws the conclusion that any mortgage it may put upon the railroad will be good as against any land opposite or conterminous to the constructed portion of the railroad up to the time when the mortgagees shall enter suit for the purpose of foreclosing the mortgage; and that therefore the grant is necessarily a continuous one—that is to say, it is to extend indefinitely, at all events so long as the company continues to construct. It was a consideration of that question which determined the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate to urge the consideration of this bill as the company whose grant should first be forfeited if any forfeiture should take place, because of this seeming right reserved to continue the construction and the right to mortgage as long as the construction should continue unobstructed by act of Congress or other act on the part of the Government which should amount to a forfeiture.

There are a number of other considerations which enter into this case which it is proper for me to mention at this time, as of importance in determining the action of the Senate. A question has always existed as to whether the grant attached to lands in the Indian Territory. The word "Territories" is used in the act, but that word in its ordinary signification means the organized Territories of the United States, Territories with civil jurisdiction, Territories with courts and other machinery provided by Congress, Territories which are in that preparatory or inceptive state which leads to the ultimate formation of States for admission into the Federal Union.

It has been denied always that this grant covered any land in the Indian Territory. A condition of things is now existing in that Territory which makes it to my mind certain that within a very short period of time some portion at least of the land in that Territory will be open to public settlement, and it makes little difference in point of fact whether action by Congress declaring the fact of the opening of those lands shall precede settlement or follow it, because in the very nature of things, judging by what has taken place continuously upon the frontier for the last forty years, no considerable body of land which can be made subject to the public land laws of the United States by action of Congress will remain long in a condition not subject to those laws.

Settlers are, as heretofore they always have been, going out upon the frontier. They are crowding upon the arid line. They are all the time seeking the good, the valuable, the agricultural lands of the country. It has been so long the policy of the Government to open up from time to time as the necessities of the situation seemed to require such lands as were subject to its jurisdiction, that it has come to be generally understood that wherever there is land which is not occupied, which the Government may acquire even though it has not acquired it, persons seeking homesteads are privileged to go upon it, and whether the action of the Government opening it up precedes or follows that settlement is a matter of no consequence, because the action will come in time to answer all the practical purposes of those who seek the land.

Mr. MORGAN. If it will not disturb the Senator, I ask permission to read from the grant the portion of it that relates to the topic he is now discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PLUMB. I do.

Mr. MORGAN. The concluding clause of section 2 of the act of July 27, 1866, is as follows:

> The United States shall extinguish, as rapidly as may be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the Indians, and only by their voluntary cession, the Indian title to all lands falling under the operation of this act and acquired in the donation to the road named in the act.

Then in section 17 it is provided—

> That the said company is authorized to accept to its own use any grant, donation, loan, power, franchise, aid, or assistance which may be granted to or conferred on said company by the Congress of the United States, by the Legislature of any State, or by any corporation, person, or persons, or by any Indian tribe or nation through whose reservation the road herein provided for may pass: and said corporation is authorized to hold and enjoy any such grant, donation, loan, power, franchise, aid, or assistance, to its own use, for the purpose aforesaid: Provided, That any such grant or donation, power, aid, or assistance from any Indian tribe or nation shall be subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. That provision of the charter is one upon which I rely for the statement I make as one of belief: that the railroad company did not acquire by reason of this act any right in the Indian Territory. The granting act seems to distinguish between the lands which the Government of the United States had control over and those which were controlled by Indian tribes, and instead of making the grant through the lands owned by the Indians it provided simply that the railroad company itself might negotiate, which it never has done, with the Indians for such cession as it might deem desirable or might be able to obtain from them. But even supposing it to be true that the railroad company has the right to acquire by building through the Indian Territory the forty sections of land per mile named in the act, that is a reason which moved the committee to say that the grant should be forfeited.

In the first place, there is no evidence that the company is proposing to continue its construction in any reasonable time. It has apparently exhausted itself in the construction of the line from Albequerque to the Needles, a distance of about six hundred miles. It connects on the east with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad and on the west with the Southern Pacific Railroad. Those are two rival companies. It is not to the interest of either one of those companies, practically speaking, I think, that this railroad should be continued to the Pacific, certainly not if it is to be an independent line and carried on in opposition to both or either of them. There does not seem to be any reason to believe that within a reasonable period of time this railroad is to be constructed, at least by those who own it at present.

There is a large body of land in the Indian Territory not occupied by any tribe and not subject to the jurisdiction of any tribe, land to which the Government of the United States as I believe has title, subject, however, to a conditional use which is made the shield or the pretext for withholding it from settlement. I do not mean to say that it is in the power of the Executive to open the land to settlement, because I do not know that it is true, but certainly it is land which Congress may open to settlement, and more than that, it is land which Congress will be obliged to open to settlement within a very brief period of time.

If Congress shall open that land to settlement, and if the theory which the Senator from Alabama, I think, proceeds upon, that the land is subject to the grant be correct, then the moment the land is opened to settlement, the last vestige of the Indian title being extinguished, the grant attaches to these lands. They are lands now being sought after by men who seek to make homes upon them, and they are lands which will be settled, whether the Government takes action or not, within a very brief period of time by men who want homes, and who, seeing the lands open and being mindful of the policy of the Government heretofore, will go upon them, the Government to the contrary notwithstanding, if that becomes necessary, in order that they may occupy them. Then we shall be brought face to face with a condition of things which will require the opening of those lands to settlement; and if at that time the burden of this railroad grant has not been removed the grant will immediately attach, and the railroad company, stimulated undoubtedly by the settlers, will proceed to construct their road, and will, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court, as we believe them to be, acquire each alternate section through all that section of country which will then be occupied by settlers, and undoubtedly out of the conflict which will ensue between the railroad company and the settlers great difficulty will occur, and the General Government will be called upon to settle that difference between the settlers who have gone on the lands and the railroad company.

In the next place, the grant should be now forfeited because of the peculiar provisions of the act of 1871. If it be true, as is contended, that by that act the grant is extended with the right of the company to go on and construct its road and acquire land until such time as there may be a suit brought to foreclose a mortgage upon which default may have been made, then it is proper that Congress should at the earliest possible moment declare the forfeiture in order that no further mortgages may be issued and that it may be in a position to resume control of the grant at the earliest possible time. Delays in this case will be dangerous. With the forfeiture once declared, no further mortgage could be issued upon the land and no further road would be constructed. If we delay until circumstances shall seem to favor it, until other portions of the line shall be settled up, and then the construction goes on, mortgages of course would continue with the construction and each one of the mortgages would be a lien upon the land, and the Government could not, in view of the act of 1871, probably defeat the lien upon the land opposite the constructed portion of the road.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator a question? Does the mortgage now extend beyond the lands which lie along the completed portion of the road?

Mr. PLUMB. It does not. The company which has built the railroad is composed of gentlemen of experience in railroad building, men of capital and men of good reputation. I have no doubt that so far as they have gone they have acted in good faith—that is to say, they have acted in good faith in the belief that the grant was a continuous grant, and that for every mile of railroad they should build they would acquire forty sections of land from the public domain along the line of the constructed road. They chose in building the line, however, in their last construction to build from a point on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Road, an apparently rival corporation, across to a connection with the Southern Pacific Railroad, another apparently rival corporation, and rather than extend the line through the Indian Territory, making a continuous line from Springfield, Mo., west. There is between the western portion of their main line and Albuquerque, where they resumed the construction, a break of about six hundred miles. That is through a section of country all of which, except about one hundred and fifty miles, is what is called arid land.

It is a country that does not now present any inviting features for railroad investment. It is a country which has no settlement, and being largely in the Indian Territory is without the possibility of present settlement. Beyond the line of the Indian Territory it is a country fitted only for grazing, except in a very small measure. There is no local business, therefore, along this projected line of road, and the building of the railroad would make very little more. In the State of California, beyond the point of intersection with the Southern Pacific Railroad westward, the line crosses what is called the Mohave Desert for probably one hundred and twenty-five miles. I am not certain but that there are one hundred and fifty miles of that character of country between the Needles and the nearest point at which agricultural land or land fitted for settlement can be reached. That country is fit for nothing; a bird cannot live upon it; nobody can settle there. No inducement whatever exists to build a line of railroad there.

The undertaking of building this line in the way in which it was built seems to me to have been practically without head or tail, except it was designed, in connection with the two lines already existing, to make a shorter route which would accommodate both of them. In other words, it is difficult to conceive that any one who expected to invest his own money or to get a reasonably credulous public to put money into his lands for investment, should have calculated the building of a line from Vinita, in the Indian Territory, across the Indian Territory, across the Territory of New Mexico, the Territory of Arizona, and the Mohave Desert, on the Pacific coast, with any expectation of a return within any reasonable period of time. My own belief is that there is no reasonable expectation that within the lifetime of any person now living any considerable part of the unconstructed portion of the line will be constructed. There are occasionally along the line of road beyond what is known as Oklahoma, in the Indian Territory, favorable locations for ranches, occasionally places where water may be obtained for irrigation, occasionally places where a man might get a collection of a certain number of cattle and such little agriculture as he might be able to carry on successfully for a livelihood. Undoubtedly, following the same law, the operation of which has been observed in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, the settlement of the country will in time bring a large portion of it under conditions fit for agriculture; but the transition is slow and it is expensive to those who undertake to conquer nature in those localities, and it will be many years before anything except the most fitful kind of agriculture could be expected to practically result.

In the State of California west of the Mohave Desert are valleys and foot-hills within the limits of the grant, undoubtedly containing very fine bodies of land. A great many settlers have gone upon these lands in the State of California. The committee have had numerous letters from such settlers. Many of them were settlers before the lands were withdrawn, and controversies undoubtedly would arise if the company should now attempt to build a railroad over any portion of that line. When the road approaches San Francisco of course there would be little or no land subject to the grant, because of the fact of settlement prior to the location, and because of the fact that large portions of the lands were taken up by Spanish and Mexican grants which had a legal existence before the acquisition of California by the United States.

The lands which the company have earned lie between Albuquerque, in New Mexico, and the Needles on the line of California and Arizona. They are arid lands in the strongest sense in which that term can be used. They are lands which the bill does not forfeit or assume to forfeit. The bill concedes those lands to the company. They are high table-lands, usually covered with a thin growth of gramma or mesquite grass, with occasional springs, with very few streams, and, except in very rare instances, fit for nothing but grazing. Of these lands, in connection with the lands in the State of Missouri which the company acquired, only about a million acres have been certified; but the amount which the railroad company have earned, which they would be entitled to receive patents for and have surveyed if the bill should pass as reported, will be about fifteen or sixteen million acres. The remainder of the grant, about thirty-five million acres, would be forfeited by the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where does that land lie?

Mr. PLUMB. That land lies in the Indian Territory and in the strip of public land which lies between the Panhandle of Texas on the south and the States of Kansas and Colorado on the north, in the Territory of New Mexico to Albuquerque, and in the State of California west of the point of junction at the Needles.

Mr. BLAIR. I am not sure that I quite understand the statement as to the amount of earned and unearned land.

Mr. PLUMB. The amount of earned land is about 15,000,000 acres. The amount of unearned land would be about 35,000,000 acres; but it is only fair to say that that goes upon the supposition that the company would get all the lands to which they are nominally entitled. Probably the entire forfeiture would not amount to more than 25,000,000 acres.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator state the reason why the bill does not cover the entire amount to which they are nominally entitled?

Mr. PLUMB. Simply because the lands have been heretofore taken. For instance in the State of California the lands had been taken up by Spanish grants and lands had been taken up by settlers prior to the location of the line.

Mr. BLAIR. How as to indemnity limits?

Mr. PLUMB. The indemnity limits would of course add something to what otherwise would be obtained, but not enough to probably bring the amount over 25,000,000 acres, and of those at least six or seven million are in the Mohave desert.

The bill was presented by the committee as the one which should be first considered by the Senate for another reason. At a somewhat early stage of the proceedings upon these bills the committee determined that it would not, unless instructed by the Senate, recommend the forfeiture of earned lands. I do not know whether I can safely speak of what has heretofore occurred in the House of Representatives, but instead of referring in the usual way to what has happened in another place, I can speak at least of what occurred in the Committee on Public Lands of the other House. The Public Lands Committee of the House seem to have adopted a different plan and the Public Lands Committee of the Senate waited until a recent period for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was likely to be any harmony of action between the two committees representing the two bodies upon this important question.

The bill which is under consideration now came from the House, but after a similar bill had been reported from the Senate committee and placed upon the Senate Calendar. This bill the House and Senate committees agree upon—that is, they agree as to the extent to which the forfeiture should go. They have differed only as to the price of the lands to be forfeited and the price of the lands which the Government before owned within the limits of the railroad grant. The bill as it came from the House proposed to fix a price of one dollar and a quarter an acre on the lands to be forfeited, while the sections adjoining which were not forfeited, which were Government property, not having been granted, were to remain at the old price of two dollars and a half an acre.

The Senate committee have fixed a uniform price of $2.50 an acre, because it was necessary to have a uniform price, as we thought, and, in the next place, as a great many lands have been acquired within the railroad limits by settlers and others at two dollars and a half an acre, it was feared that if the price was now reduced to a dollar and a quarter an acre, those settlers would come in and say they were entitled to be made good for the excess which they had paid for their land over a dollar and a quarter an acre, and thereby bring forward a large number of claims against the Government, the adjustment of which would undoubtedly at some time be attempted and it would be attended with very large expense. But the homestead law, which gives to every man who settles on the public domain, who possesses certain qualifications, one hundred and sixty acres of land in consideration of living upon the land five years, is left in full force and effect, so that all the lands to be forfeited as well as all those which were before the property of the Government in the granted limits are subject to the homestead laws, and to entry and settlement without price.

The Senator from Alabama has proposed an amendment which sends the question of the forfeiture, the extent of it, the relative rights of the Government and of the railroad company and of any person who may have settled within the limits of the grant, to the courts for adjustment. I do not myself regard that as necessary or under the circumstances wise. I do not believe the railroad company has any right whatever beyond the line of the constructed road which we can not take away at will. Just about six years have elapsed since the date fixed in the charter within which the railroad was to have been completed. Something over six hundred miles of road have been constructed since that time. Following the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman the committee have not sought to disturb the lands along the line of the completed road, but we believe that the right and the power and the duty of Congress is evident and plain to now resume in behalf of the United States Government all the lands which lie conterminous with the uncompleted portion of the railroad, and that the railroad company itself is not in a condition to interpose any objection or to assert any right against the Government by reason of its action for the purpose of opening up these lands to settlement now.

To prevent complications that may arise in the Indian Territory and settlement there by reason of the fact that the railroad if it is to be built will not be a competing line as originally intended to be, and will therefore not perform the useful purpose for which it was contemplated, and for other reasons which are manifest, the committee believe that it is not necessary or desirable to send this case to the courts for adjudication. There is no class of cases, so far as I am advised, along the line of the road in which interests have grown up which require adjudication except they may be those of the railroad company, and as I have stated I do not believe the railroad company has any rights to assert against the Government. Therefore there is no complexity which requires judicial determination. It is, I believe, a plain question between the railroad company which has forfeited the grant by reason of the failure to build, and the General Government which made the grant and which by reason of its having made it, and having made it upon conditions which have been forfeited, has a right now to step in and say that it will not permit any further construction, but will take away the lands which have not been earned by the construction of the road.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama was a very voluminous one and there was a great deal of noise in the Senate when it was being read, so that I could not hear it distinctly; but it struck me that it was merely providing proper legal tribunals to settle and test the equitable rights of all parties growing out of the forfeiture of this land grant. I do not rise to speak upon that amendment, for I shall have to examine it more thoroughly before making up my own mind as to how I shall vote upon it.

I rise to ask information from the committee upon a point embraced in the bill as reported by them. I desire to know why the lands which it is proposed to turn back into the public domain should be still held at two dollars and a half an acre. I can see no reason for it. It is an unusual provision to make upon the forfeiture of lands and their return to the public domain. I have heard no satisfactory explanation given of that. It does seem to me that instead of being fixed at two dollars and a half, they ought to be put at the low minimum of one dollar and a quarter an acre to compensate the settler in some degree for the disappointment he has been led into because of settling there with the expectation of the building of a railroad which has failed to be constructed.

Mr. PLUMB. The settler can get the lands now for nothing by simply entering them under the homestead law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But only a small portion.

Mr. PLUMB. He can get just as much under the homestead law as under the pre-emption law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if he enters the land you propose to make him pay two dollars and a half.

Mr. PLUMB. But instead of that he may not enter them; he may acquire the lands simply by continuing to live on them for five years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose he should buy?

Mr. PLUMB. Then we propose that he shall pay $2.50 an acre.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say he should be only required to pay $1.25 an acre, and I will show why in a moment. The second section proposes to repeal the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits." Now, what is that act? That act provides that when a settler goes within the limits of railroad lands and takes up eighty acres of land and the lands adjoining the railroad are forfeited, he shall have the right without additional cost of entering as much more land without paying a cent for it, as he has already entered, and for which he has paid two dollars and a half an acre. That equalizes the thing in the end. If he has bought one hundred and sixty acres at two dollars and a half an acre and the land is forfeited and thrown back into the public domain, he is allowed to enter one hundred and sixty acres more land without paying a dollar for it, and of course it makes the whole of his land cost him a dollar and a quarter an acre.

But the bill proposes to repeal that law. Why do you propose to put up these lands to two dollars and a half an acre? The effect will be to keep them from settlement forever. I should like to know who is going to be benefited? The policy of the Government is to induce settlement into that part of the country and not to keep it a wilderness still. Who is going there to buy land at two dollars and a half an acre when he can buy land equally as good elsewhere at a dollar and a quarter?

I have heard it suggested that there are great cattle ranges along the line of this road, and that the owners of the cattle are anxious to keep settlers out of that country so that they may have a perpetual grazing-ground for their herds that now roam over a thousand hills. I do not know it to be the fact, but it seems to me that if the land is turned back into the public domain, it should be turned back at the minimum price and not at the maximum price of $2.50 an acre.

I should like to understand something about this measure before I vote upon it. I desire to do what is right, but it does seem to me that we should not put this land up to two dollars and a half an acre instead of putting it down to a dollar and a quarter, or even less, for we all know that the railroad company has been offering land for 50 cents an acre. When we charge settlers two dollars and a half the only effect will be to make it a grazing ground for the benefit of cattle syndicates. They are the men to be benefited, and not the poor. The policy of the Government has been to keep the public land so as to provide homes for the homeless, and not to furnish grazing ground for great cattle syndicates.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator from Kentucky is not so thoroughly posted as he ought to be about this question or he would see that the amendment of the committee is directly against the cattle-men. The frauds that have been committed under the shelter of what is known as the pre-emption law have been chiefly by that class of men. A man desiring a cattle range goes into a section of country with his herds and his cowboys and he locates them upon different quarter-sections of public land as pre-emptioners, and they buy the land at a dollar and a quarter an acre and then deed it to him. By means of that fraud upon the pre-emption law large bodies of land have been bought by the very class of men the Senator from Kentucky now berates. My own belief is that the pre-emption law ought to be repealed and there ought to be no public land hereafter ever sold to any man for money, at least no acre of land which may either now be fit for settlement or which there may be any expectation that it will be fit for settlement in the generation yet to come.

As a step in that direction the committee said simply: "We will not permit these lands to be sold to speculators at a dollar and a quarter an acre; we will preserve them for the homesteaders." Let the man who puts his family upon them, who lives there five years, and who has lived there five years to acquire title (and if he intends to make a home it is indifferent to him whether he lives there five years or fifty years because he expects to live there all his life), have the title, but put up the price to the man who would obtain it for speculative purposes at two dollars and a half. It only lacks one step of going as far as I want to, and that step is to wipe out the pre-emption law altogether and subject lands to the homestead law. Then the cattle-men and the speculators could not gain the land at all. As it is now the pre-emption law is used as a shelter largely for speculation, while the homestead law practically can not be so used.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is exactly what I complain of. These men do not want to own these lands themselves and they do not want other people to take them up. They want them to remain eternally in the public domain. Their herdsmen and their cattle-boys have gone along the line, which, you will observe by the map, runs along the Canadian River. They have already taken up all the water of the country, and they want to keep the country on both sides forever in the public domain so that they may have grazing grounds for their cattle. They have already taken up all the water and they do not intend ever either to buy or enter the lands.

Mr. PLUMB. But those lands are all subject to entry by any homesteader. The Senator himself, if he felt so disposed, might go and take up a quarter-section of land right in the middle of one of those ranges.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would be of very little use if they would have all the water and if I did not have any.

Mr. PLUMB. They are not near the water. In the first place, in the section the Senator speaks of, the land along the Canadian River is not subject to entry; he can not acquire title to it. Now, if it is thrown open to pre-emption those people are there on the spot and they will buy it at a dollar and a quarter an acre, and the homesteader can not get an acre of it.

In regard to the second section of the bill, which the Senator speaks of, that is a section which repeals a law, and probably there is no worse law on the statute-book. Any man who has gone within the railroad limits and paid two dollars and a half an acre for a piece of land if the railroad grant is forfeited then is entitled to take out floating scrip, which he can locate upon any quarter-section of land that the Government owns anywhere, and that scrip, or similar scrip, is worth now in the market from $12 to $15, and even as high as $30 an acre, because it is a land-warrant or land-scrip which can be located without settlement; and so every man who has got a quarter-section of land can exchange his piece of scrip for another, sell it to somebody else, who will sell it to somebody else; and in that way the public lands will be absorbed by speculators. Not to repeal that would be to open up to speculation of a worse kind than any railroad grant could possibly be a very large area and the very best portion of the entire public domain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is the law; I will read it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. With the permission of the Senator from Kentucky, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question for information. He speaks of the lands open to purchase under the pre-emption law as taken up by speculators. I desire to know from him, as the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, how far that right of purchase extends. Does it go beyond one hundred and sixty acres?

Mr. PLUMB. No.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There is not much margin then for speculation.

Mr. PLUMB. That results in this way: A man who has a dozen men in his employ—I speak of that which has been continuously done in regard to large bodies of the public lands—locates each one of them on a quarter-section; they enter it and in turn convey it to him.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is an evasion of the law.

Mr. PLUMB. That is an evasion of the law, but it is done, and it is not only done, but it is done in such a way as to cause the Government to part with its title practically for speculation.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. My recollection was—but I thought possibly there might have been some change in the law—that purchases under the pre-emption law could not exceed to one individual more than one hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. PLUMB. No pre-emptor can acquire more than one hundred and sixty acres, but many pre-emptioners may deed to one man what each one has pre-empted, and that has been done, and is the reason why the Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior have for a number of years recommended the repeal of the pre-emption law, because it is made use of as a cover for speculation in the public domain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I propose to read this section from the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits:"

That where any actual settler who shall have paid for any lands situate within the limits of any grant of lands by Congress to aid in the construction of any railroad, the price of such lands being fixed by law at double minimum rates, and such railroad lands having been forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain for failure to build such railroad, such person or persons shall have the right to locate, on any unoccupied lands, an amount equal to their original entry, without further cost.

Why should they not be allowed? They paid double the minimum price established by law for these lands in consequence of the expected building of the railroad, and it has failed. Then, instead of returning them their money, why not reimburse them by allowing them to enter an equal amount of Government land? My friend from Kansas says that the chief objection is that it will dissatisfy men who have already bought land at $2.50 an acre to come in and have land at a dollar and a quarter. I admit it will dissatisfy them if you repeal this act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits, approved March 3, 1875. It will unquestionably dissatisfy them. But let the act stand and it will not.

Mr. PLUMB. I should think not. You take $2.50 an acre from a man for land, and then you give him in lieu of that a piece of scrip which is worth eight times what his land cost him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to know how the scrip is worth more than the land that corresponds to it.

Mr. PLUMB. It can be located on any public land of the United States, and scrip possessing a similar qualification has been sold in this town as high as $30 an acre in the last six months, and is now selling regularly at $15.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has no more advantages than a soldiers' land-warrant.

Mr. PLUMB. Undoubtedly it has. A soldier's land-warrant can only be located on surveyed lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is on "any occupied land."

Mr. PLUMB. Including unsurveyed lands. The land-warrants can only be located on surveyed lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is apparent that the object of this law was to protect a man against the failure of the building of the railroad. There can be no sort of question about that. The Government undertakes to compensate itself for giving the alternate sections to the construction of the railroad by enhancing the price of the land to be put upon the market; doubling the price upon the supposition that the building of the railroad will double the value of the land. We should reimburse the actual settler, and allow him to enter without any further cost an amount of land equal to the number of acres which he paid $2.50 for.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am informed that the United States have made over one hundred land grants to different railways, and military roads, and canals in this country, a very large number of which are perhaps open to some attack on the part of the Government. A number of bills are pending now in the Senate and before the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, and some I believe before the Judiciary Committee, involving the question of the right and power of Congress to declare forfeitures of lands so granted. These bills on the part of the Committee on Public Lands have received almost exclusive consideration since the meeting of the Senate in December.

We have listened to arguments until as late as 2 o'clock at night; we have called quite a number of extraordinary meetings of the committee for the purpose of hearing arguments pro and con; we have received briefs in large numbers, and from some of the ablest counsel in the United States, some of whom have been eminent judges on the bench, men largely experienced in law and in public affairs of every kind. I suppose there was never a subject upon which there was so great a contrariety of opinion among lawyers as has been expressed in regard to the power of the United States Government in the declaration of the forfeiture of land grants.

The common law-books of law and equity, the reports, and the elementary authors have been searched and ransacked for precedents of every kind. They have all been produced I think without any omission. The statutory course pursued by other governments, especially by the Government of Great Britain, in the forfeiture of lands to the Crown in consequence of political disturbances there, have been brought to our attention, and the subject has been argued and debated until we have ascertained at least one thing about it, and that is that, with the exception of the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, there is no adjudicated case which can be claimed to be an authority on the subject of our powers, duties, and rights as a legislative body in dealing with this very delicate and involved subject. There are some other authorities following that and some preceding it which throw light to a greater or less degree upon it, but the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman is the one that is considered on all hands as being the leading authority, except that some of the lawyers dispute that that is an authority to the extent that others claim it to be, because they say that a portion of that decision is obiter dictum.

The facts in regard to each of these land grants differ; the provisions of the statute law in respect of each of them are varied and sometimes very widely different. So that each separate grant brings up a separate field of controversy and presents questions which are new to that case. Within these various fields of controversy the questions are almost innumerable; questions of the powers of the law courts, the powers of the equity courts, the duty of Congress to enforce the technical and legal rights of the Government of the United States on the one hand and its duty to yield to the persuasive influence of strong equities upon the other. If the Senate of the United States were a body of lawyers each informed as fully as we might suppose a judge of the Supreme Court ought to be upon questions of law, this body would still have great difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion upon all of these various questions of law.

Now, sir, when you come to consider that there is a vast mass of facts presented in these cases, very few of which are admitted, almost all of them in disputation, you can gather an idea of the difficulties that the Committee on Public Lands have had in trying to come to a satisfactory conclusion in respect of each and all the subjects that have been brought to their attention. We have not had the powers of a court to call witnesses before us and examine them, conclude the testimony at a certain time, and ascertain the state of facts upon which our adjudication was to be pronounced. On the contrary, if we had had the time to do this, and the authority of the Senate to do it, and had chosen to involve the country in so great an expense as it would have resulted in, we should not have had the physical capacity in the time alloted to us to ascertain and determine the facts in dispute between these litigating parties, for they are really litigating parties. In the absence of such opportunity on our part we have had to take statements and suggestions which often contradict each other.

Now we come before the Senate of the United States with our reports, and what are they based upon? As to the facts, they are based upon the declarations made by counsel, or interested agents, and never by sworn witnesses, but always by parties in interest; and we are left when we come from the committee-room to make our report with a confused, indefinite, and uncertain idea of the facts of the case. Then we are asked to pronounce a judgment upon those facts as to whether the forfeiture ought to be granted or not, and, if granted, upon what terms or conditions, or to what extent it ought to be granted; and we bring our report in here, deciding the case fully, and when presented it is nothing more than our opinion upon the rights of the parties pro and con, as the case may be. The committee, I believe, has never been unanimous in any single report. The opinions of the Senators upon the committee, first on the law of the case and then on the facts of the case, are widely divergent.

The question that I have to put to the Senate in this condition of affairs is this: Are you in a condition to pronounce a conclusive judicial sentence upon the rights of parties thus presented for your consideration? I maintain that we are not. I would hesitate if the Senate were acting as an appellate court, as the British House of Lords act upon a record sent up by an appeal from an inferior court, to pronounce an opinion upon so grave a question as that which is presented in this bill in the short time allowed us. This is the first time that any such question has been before the Senate since I have been here, now eight years, and I believe the first that has been before this body at any time. I would hesitate if we had a record to act upon to pronounce an opinion within the time that can now be given us for the consideration of the question of law arising upon the facts stated in that record. Much more am I unwilling to take final and conclusive action in so great a matter or to ask the Senate to do it when I can not state in any authentic way what are the established facts.

Here is a grant of land in which the Senator from Kansas informs us that there are more than 20,000,000 acres claimed by the Government as being forfeited, the titles having been lost by the laches of the railroad company. That is an enormous amount of property, and its present value is sufficient to startle us with the importance of this subject, but its prospective value is something that is almost incalculable, for it traverses a great mining region as well as a great agricultural and grazing country. Therefore the questions that are presented to the Senate upon this bill are of the very highest importance, not only in respect of the nature of the questions themselves and the novelty of the action that we are called upon to take, but also in respect to the great amount of property involved.

I have been able on my part to come to one safe conclusion, and that is that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States in this case to declare that what are called the unearned lands of this railroad corporation are forfeited; but I am not willing to go beyond that declaration, and to assume the right to decide conclusively that the vote that we shall give declaring this forfeiture shall ipso facto operate to transfer the title from the railroad company, or its mortgagees, or persons claiming under it, to the Government of the United States, denying to these claimants at the same time the opportunity of impeaching our action, if they are able to do it upon constitutional grounds in the courts of the country.

I can not get my consent to give a vote to take from any person property that he claims, unless we give to him at the same time the right and privilege of questioning my power and authority to do so in a court, for if we do that we assume to ourselves a part of the judicial functions not given to Congress by the Constitution and invade the rightful authority of one of the co-ordinate departments of this Government at the expense of private rights.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Speaking about the title, I ask for information if any title is transferred in cases of this kind except as the road is completed? The title really is in the Government until then.

Mr. MORGAN. The case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman is a direct decision to the contrary. That is all I wish to say about that. The title is with the company. The act granting the land transferred it in præsenti, and it is subject only to forfeiture for breach of condition subsequent. That is really the only practical point that is decided, as far as I am able to say, by the Supreme Court of the United States in any of these cases. That is the nature of the title held by the corporation, a title in fee, the operative words of the statute granting it in præsenti, subject to forfeiture for the breach of condition-subsequent, expressed in the grant and attached to the estate. And the enforcement of this condition is the only power reserved to the United States, except the power to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. President, it is I think unfortunate for us that we have no system of statutory law granting to the United States courts jurisdiction to declare forfeitures of the public land grants made upon condition. In that respect our Government is not well supplied with statutory law. Our judicial tribunals are not fully equipped with power. It is not so in England. There, growing up under the common law, which has been aided by statute, there is a proceeding by a prerogative writ for the purpose of determining a question of the forfeiture of crown lands, granted to individuals or corporations. In this country we have no prerogative writ because we have no power that can exercise prerogative, so that in deriving the powers of the Government of Great Britain in any respect through the common law into the hands of our own government we do not take the prerogative writ; we have no lawful authority in the United States adequate to its exercise.

The process in England of having a forfeiture of lands declared in favor of the crown is one of extreme interest to us at this moment of time. It is the only analogous case with which we can compare our own institutions, our own situation, and the rights of our own citizens, and so it becomes very important. When the crown has granted land in England subject to be defeated by the breach of a condition subsequent, the crown asserts its authority, in case it may suppose that the land reverts in consequence of the breach of the condition, by the issue of a writ called a prerogative writ, which issues directly from the king, and it is directed to a coroner or to some other lawful officer. The coroner is the person who generally executes it. He is directed to summon a jury, which may be a jury of twelve or more men as the coroner may see proper to designate, and that jury when brought together have the facts of the case laid before them, and they determine ex parte upon the evidence presented, but in a judicial way, whether or not the lands are forfeited to the crown. That involves, of course, an inquiry of fact. The coroner reports that finding back as a verdict from that jury, and the law gives to it all the qualities of a judicial proceeding. Thereupon the crown enters not by taking actual pedis possessio, but enters by force of the law, which carries the possession with the title which is thus ascertained by the jury to have reverted to the crown.

That is the mere initiation of a proceeding on the part of the government for the purpose of recovering lands which were supposed to be forfeited to the crown by reason of the breach of a condition subsequent. A private individual who has made a grant of land is not required to go through with this formality in order to recover his lands when the condition of the grant is broken. He must, however, make a personal entry upon the land by himself or his agent so as to acquire actual possession and unite it with his estate, which he has regained, as he asserts, because of the breach of the condition of the grant and its consequent reversion to him. There is the difference between the proceeding by the Government and the proceeding by individuals under the English law.

When the Government enters, what is the next step? In England the citizen has what is called the petition of right, which is a suit against the crown. Our citizens have not got that right. What is the petition of right? It is a petition filed by the citizens against the crown and allowed by the crown, upon which a jury is called. A court takes jurisdiction, and right of that citizen to that property is determined in that petition of right, reaching back through the adverse verdict of the coroner's jury to the original question, and the right of the citizen if the petition is found to be true is stronger than the claim of the crown itself, and he is admitted to the possession of his land.

When the citizen, after this finding of the coroner's jury and the judgment thereon, which is called "office found," brings his petition of right, for the purpose of inquiring into his title as between him and the crown, as I have stated already, the inquiry goes back to the origin of the title, and the court can set aside the finding of the coroner's jury, can set aside every demand made by the crown and determine that that citizen has a better right to that land than the crown has.

Now, let me ask Senators whether there is any provision of that sort in the laws of the United States? We have no law here that authorizes a citizen to go into court and sue the Government of the United States by petition of right or by any proceeding of that character. No man can sue the Government of the United States in this country except he does it by virtue of express statutory authority. He must produce a statute upon which he predicates his right to come into court and make any complaint against the Government of the United States.

We have instituted a Court of Claims, and authorized our people to sue the Government there, and in some other cases we have passed laws to authorize the people to sue the Government of the United States; but we have no right of the citizen in this country at all analogous to the petition of right in Great Britain. Hence when the Government of the United States asserts and declares by act of Congress a forfeiture of land, unless we provide by statute so that the citizen can come in and inquire into our authority and power to do that thing, that citizen has the doors of justice shut in his face beyond remedy, and we in doing this violate the Constitution of the country because we take the man's property or what he honestly claims to be his property, without due course of law. That is the difficulty in which we involve ourselves and the people when we take away their rights by acts of Congress, and give them no remedy.

In the present state of the law, if we simply declare the forfeiture of a railroad land grant and we proceed further in pursuance of that declaration to resume the title and the possession of that land to the Government, extending to our citizens no right to be heard, to present their petitions of right against us, or to assert in any form their claims, we take from them what they claim at least to be their rights and we deny them all remedy. I can not do that. When I was sent to the Senate of the United States I was not commissioned as a judge.

If I had been commissioned as a judge I would have been sworn in connection with my commission that I should hear both sides and render justice according to law and equity. Therefore I can not perform an act which has the effect of depriving a man of that which he claims without giving him an opportunity of going into a court and making good his assertions if he wants to do it. I can not exonerate myself either in my own conscience or before the world in doing an act of that kind as a Senator of the United States, any more than I could do it as a private citizen if I had the power to wrest a man's property from him and put him in a condition where he could never assert his rights.

It has seemed to me in view of this brief statement and without reference to the support which is given to it by the opinions of all the great writers upon public law in this and in other countries, that the duty is a palpable one, whenever the Congress of the United States makes a declaration by law which a citizen of the United States asserts is an invasion of his rights of property, to give that man an opportunity to be heard in a court of justice. You can not pass this bill, Mr. President, in the form in which it is reported from our committee and give no remedy to the railroad company or to any of the claimants under it, mortgagees or whatever they may be, without destroying an honest property to the extent of millions of dollars. It makes no difference to me what the clamor may be, whether it comes from Democratic or from Republican quarters, from Senators or lobbyists, or from people who want to settle on the lands or people who do not want to settle there. I care not from what source the clamor comes or how loud it may be, I for one will try to observe my equanimity and respect the duties of my position so far at least as not to do a rash act of injustice against any man and then deny to him access to the courts to inquire into the authority by which I do it. I can not go to that extent.

I beg leave to remark just here that the American people are very much subject to agitation, as much so perhaps as any people, and in the excitement of a popular agitation upon any question it behooves the men whose position requires of them sobriety of judgment and discretion in council that they should stop and consider the ground over which they are going more carefully in times of excitement than when everything is cool and quiet. Now is the time for the Senate of the United States to pronounce a true and impartial judgment in this case, first as to the extent of its own powers, and next upon the rights of those persons who claim these lands against the Government of the United States.

This subject has been before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in various forms at various times. That honorable committee have considered it completely, and in looking over their reports I have observed that they have never brought a report in here which violates the principles I am now advocating. They have never given their sanction to a bill which undertook to decide first upon the extent of our authority, and then upon the right of a claimant either under or against the Government of the United States without giving an opportunity to the claimant to go into a court to be heard.

Mr. President, lawyers in this body differ, of course honestly, in respect of the extent to which we can make a declaration of forfeiture operative upon a title held by this railroad company. In Schulenberg vs. Harriman the Supreme Court of the United States have declared that a title in the very words I believe, at least substantially in the very words, of the grant made in this case is a grant of a fee-simple title to the railroad company, which if undisturbed by the action of the Government of the United States is as good a title to lands as ever was covered by a patent issued from the Land Office, a perfect title as to everybody in the world except the Government of the United States. There is not any human being on this earth to-day who can go into a Federal court or any court, I care not how he may get his title, and assert it with effect against that which is granted in the act to this railroad company, until he has first obtained the consent of the Government of the United States. The title is environed with every defense that is necessary for its security, and no power exists at all that can question it except the power of the Government of the United States expressed through an act of Congress, or else expressed through a judicial finding and decree.

That is how this railroad company holds these 20,000,000 acres of land to-day. That is the kind of title it has. If the Congress of the United States shall withhold the exercise of its power of forfeiture, that title is good against the whole world; nobody can impeach it; there is nothing doubtful or disputable about it. It is a perfect fee-simple title, subject only to a forfeiture on the part of the Government of the United States and by nobody else, and subject to forfeiture only upon the conditions expressed in the original grant. If the Congress of the United States were to-day to undertake to impose new conditions upon that title, there is not a court in Christendom which would not hold that that undertaking was vitiated and void under the Constitution.

The title is to be tried upon the conditions that are expressed in the grant, and upon none other. You have no right even to refer to another condition subsequently imposed by Congress or to any change of circumstances which may have occurred, physical or natural, or through Congressional action, for the purpose of qualifying or modifying or affecting in any way the integrity of this grant. It stands upon the act making it, and is affected only by the legal construction to be put upon that act, and by nothing else.

Now we propose to assail a title of that kind. In order to do that we have got to keep Congress within the law, not within some vain imagination of a power that we would have reserved, or might have reserved, but within the construction which belongs to the letter and spirit of the law under a reasonable and proper interpretation. In this case we had a right to declare a complete forfeiture of this land grant after twelve years from the date of enactment (for that is the period when the law provided that this railroad should be entirely completed to the Pacific Ocean), and if we had commenced at the end of twelve years to assert our right perhaps nobody could have disputed the power of Congress then to declare the forfeiture.

We have waited now for six years after that period has expired without ever having taken any action to indicate a purpose on our part that we intended to claim this forfeiture; and during that period of waiting, after three years had elapsed from the 4th day of July, 1868, we passed a law in full view of all that had been done, in full view of all the rights of forfeiture that we had a right to claim, of all the delinquencies and derelictions of this company that are asserted against it as having existed prior to the early part of January, 1871, we then passed a law authorizing this railroad company to mortgage all of its property for the purpose of getting money to build the road to the Pacific Ocean. Now, it is claimed on the part of the railroad company that in giving them authority to make a mortgage on all their estates and franchises to raise money to build the road, the Government of the United States waived its right of forfeiture, all at least that existed at that time.

Is that a good claim or is it a bad one? If I were to ask this honorable Senate to rise and vote upon it there would be a division of opinion here. I for one, notwithstanding the old saw that no estoppel runs against the Government, believe that a government can be just as much estopped at law and in equity as a private man when it puts itself in the attitude of a private contractor with another party, and that is the attitude the Government assumed here. The Government steps down from its high pedestal of sovereign power when it makes a contract consisting of mutual terms with its citizen, takes him by the hand and they strike a bargain, and from that time forward that government, as respects that bargain, yields its sovereignty as to him and it is bound by its contract. So said the Supreme Court in this case of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies.

Mr. LAPHAM. I should like to understand whether the mortgage was given after the expiration of the forfeiture of the original land grants.

Mr. MORGAN. After the expiration of some of them.

Mr. LAPHAM. After the twelve years had expired?

Mr. MORGAN. No; it was five years after the grant was made and it was three years after the Government had a right to have claimed a forfeiture for the non-completion of fifty miles of the road each year. They were required to build fifty miles of road a year and they built twenty-seven miles in five years and then got the power from Congress to make the mortgage to build the rest; but it has gone on since that time and built nearly nine hundred miles, perhaps over that; I will get the figures directly.

I assert that when the Government of the United States thus assumes the character of a party to a contract and binds itself by the stipulations of a mutual obligation, it can not afterward, in dealing with that contract, resume its sovereignty and say "no estoppel runs against the king." That government must deal with the citizen upon the plane that it chose to occupy in making the contract.

Here, then, is a question raised as to what is the effect of authorizing this mortgage to be given upon this property after rights of forfeiture had accrued to the Government of the United States? It is claimed by the Government of the United States that it has not waived its right to demand a forfeiture for that case. It is claimed by the other party, the railroad company, that it has waived it. This is a doubtful question of law, and I repeat that if I were to ask this honorable Senate to rise and vote on that question now there would be a strong difference of opinion among us, some Senators voting one way and some another. Possibly the majority would be in the wrong, because we are not all lawyers; we are not all in the habit of giving close and strict attention to questions of this narrow and difficult character.

When that is the fact are we to decide that sort of question by a mere majority vote of the Senate and exclude the company from having any right to review the decision that shall be made here? Shall we take this question of law even upon admitted facts, and decide it absolutely, and then refuse to permit the parties interested in this question to go into a court and litigate it? No, sir; we ought never to do it. We can not afford it.

A question was stated also by the Senator from Kansas in connection with this mortgage, which I may as well refer to now, but to which I attach no importance whatever. It was provided in this statute, I suppose by some slip of the pen, that the mortgage should be operative upon all the lands that might be earned by the company under the provisions of the act up to the date of the foreclosure of the mortgage. That evidently meant up to the date of the forfeiture of lands or the declaration of forfeiture, but whoever prepared that act got it into a different shape. But I think there is no difficulty in giving a proper construction to that feature of the case.

It was not intended by Congress, in putting the period during which there might be acquisition of land under this grant to the date when the mortgage was to be foreclosed, to postpone its right of declaring a forfeiture until the mortgagee might elect to foreclose under his mortgage. Congress never thought of putting the rights of the Government of the United States into the hands of a person whose interests were diametrically opposed to the Government. That argument, it is true, was made before the committee, but I suppose that it was made in the anxiety of counsel to present every possible phase of the case they could that they thought would weigh in their behalf. I attach no importance to that, and I would not hesitate to act immediately and declare the forfeiture in this case because of any weight I could attach possibly to an argument of that kind.

The whole effect of the mortgage act is simply this, that in 1871, a few years before the time when the railroad was to be completed and when the Government of the United States had seen that the company was unable to complete the road, the Government changed its policy in respect of this road precisely as it did with respect to the Northern Pacific, and it waived all existing causes of forfeiture and gave the company an additional means of completing its road. It is worthy of remark here, as illustrating what Congress meant in this legislation in 1871, in giving the authority to make this mortgage, that the Northern Pacific Railroad had been projected upon the idea that subscriptions of stock from private citizens could be obtained in sufficient quantities to build the road and that the subscribers to the stock would be really the purchasers of the enormous land grant given to that company.

The same tactics and the same policy precisely was pursued in respect of the Atlantic and Pacific, and about the same time Congress came to the conclusion that the failure of both roads was absolute; that neither the Atlantic and Pacific nor the Northern Pacific would ever be built if the money was to be obtained by private subscriptions of stock. Congress realized that it had to enable the companies respectively to enlist capitalists of large means in this country and in foreign countries to take hold of these projects with such energy and such power as could be relied on to build these very important and very desirable roads. Hence it was that with the express view in this case, as in the Northern Pacific case, of inducing capital from abroad as well as capital in the United States to assist this railroad company by making loans upon the faith and credit of the great land grant, Congress passed this act of 1871. The Supreme Court of the United States, in considering a question of this kind in regard to the Union Pacific Railroad, in 1 Otto, 80, used the following language:

> This enterprise was viewed as a national undertaking for national purposes, and the public mind was directed to the end in view rather than to the particular means of securing it. Although this road was a military necessity there were other reasons active at the time in producing an opinion for its completion besides the protection of an exposed frontier. There was a vast unpeopled territory lying between the Missouri and Sacramento Rivers, which was practically worthless without the facilities afforded by a railroad for the transportation of persons and property. With its construction, the agricultural and mineral resources of this territory could be developed, settlements made where settlements were possible, and thereby the wealth and power of the United States largely increased, and there was also the pressing want, in time of peace even, of an improved and cheaper method for the transportation of the mails and of supplies for the Army and the Indians.
> It was in the presence of these facts that Congress undertook to deal with the subject of this railroad. The difficulties in the way of building it were great, and by many intelligent persons considered insurmountable.
> Although a free people, when resolved upon a course of action, can accomplish great results, the scheme for building a railroad, 2,000 miles in length, over deserts, across mountains, and through a country inhabited by Indians jealous of intrusion upon their rights, was universally regarded at the time as a bold and hazardous undertaking, it is nothing to the purpose that the apprehended difficulties in a great measure disappeared after trial, and that the road was constructed at less cost of time and money than had been considered possible. No argument can be drawn from the wisdom that comes after the fact. Congress acted with reference to a state of things believed at the time to exist; and, in interpreting its legislation, no aid can be derived from subsequent events. The project of building the road was not conceived for private ends; and the prevalent opinion was that it could not be worked out by private capital alone. It was a national work, originating in national necessities and requiring national assistance.
> The policy of the country, to say nothing of the supposed want of constitutional power, stood in the way of the United States taking the work into its own hands. Even if this were not so, reasons of economy suggested that it were better to enlist private capital and enterprise in the project by offering the requisite inducements. Congress undertook to do this, in order to promote the construction and operation of a work deemed essential to the security of great public interests.
> It is true the scheme contemplated profit to individuals; for, without a reasonable expectation of this, capital could not be obtained, nor the requisite skill and enterprise. But this consideration does not in itself change the relation of the parties to this suit. This might have been so if the Government had incorporated a company to advance private interests and agreed to aid it on account of the supposed incidental advantages which the public would derive from the completion of the projected railway. But the primary object of the Government was to advance its own interests, and it endeavored to engage individual cooperation as a means to an end—the securing of a road which could be used for its own purposes. The obligations, therefore, which were imposed on the company incorporated to build it must depend on the true meaning of the enactment itself viewed in the light of contemporaneous history.

Congress desired this Atlantic and Pacific road to be built in order that it might have a highway through the Indian Territories, especially through the hostile Indian Territories infested by Comanches and Arapahoes and Cheyennes and Kiowas and various other hostile and dangerous races of Indians. It wanted a line across the northern border of Mexico; it wanted to reach the Pacific Ocean at more than one place. I have no doubt I concur in the opinion expressed by the honorable Senator from Kansas that the first object an the part of Congress was to build to a southern point on the Pacific in California.

We had every inducement that a nation could have for national purposes and national convenience and national pride and security and development of every kind to assist in the building of this railway. Therefore after it had ascertained that between the date of the charter and 1871 this company, though it had expended a large amount of money, more than $10,000,000, in buying another railway to connect it to Springfield, Mo., had built only twenty-seven miles of road out of its own means in addition to the purchase of this other road, Congress in this case, as in the case of the Northern Pacific, said to the country in effect: "We deem it of sufficient importance in order to get this road secured to the nation as well as to the people interested that there should be power given to this corporation to mortgage all that it possesses; we will not take advantage of technical forfeitures in this case; we are dealing with a great national question and we are dealing with men who represent national as well as personal interests in this matter, and therefore we are going to deal in the direction that we think will be for the national advantage. We will therefore grant this company the right in 1871 to mortgage its property of every kind and character and we will not say that that mortgage shall be due in five years or ten or fifteen or fifty," for there is no restriction in this act as to the time within which these bonds shall be made payable which are to be secured by this mortgage, and that is a very important fact.

Congress therefore gave to this company the right to fix the time when these bonds should mature and secured to the company and to every man who should deal with it the right to insist upon the payment of these bonds at their maturity, whenever that might be, and that they and the company should agree upon the period of maturity. Had the Congress of the United States in that case given to this company the right to issue its mortgage to secure bonds payable twenty years after date, would Congress, as to those bondholders, have the right to forfeit the land grant and take it away within ten years? Scarcely; or suppose there is a division of opinion between us on that point, shall I decide it in my own way or will you decide it in yours? I say, let the judge come between us and decide, and do not let us undertake to decide that question.

Now, what did this company convey to the bondholders in this mortgage? It must be remembered that this company owes its entire existence to an act of Congress. No State or Territorial Legislature had any agency at all in founding this corporation. It is the child of Congress. All its rights, powers, and privileges are conferred in this act of Congress granting this charter, and I believe that I have never seen a charter that I thought was better drawn or more carefully prepared than this one. It is a masterpiece of ability on the part of the man who wrote it, whoever he may be. The franchise to be a corporation, the powers of the corporation, the privileges, the grants made to it, the restraints and restrictions upon it in various directions, the uses for which it is to be employed hereafter, are all of them fixed by act of Congress.

Every power that had been conferred, even to the franchise, was given to this company under the act of 1871, as property, for the purpose of mortgaging it to raise money. When the bondholder came to look over what the Government invited him to put his money down upon, he saw not merely a valuable land grant, an enormous land grant you may call it, and a great trunk line of railway running through it, with right of way and stations and depots and iron and steel bridges and everything of that kind, but he saw there a charter that was almost without limit and without end, a charter built to last as long as the road itself should last, and he saw the act of Congress which empowered this corporation to pledge everything that it owned in the world, even to its own body, if you can call it such, its own corporate existence, to the bondholders for the security of their debt.

Now we propose to take from the bondholders everything except the right of way and the franchise, the power to be a corporation and to operate a railroad, and to convert it to our own use, and that upon the technical ground that the company has not completed the railroad within the time prescribed within the statute. Have we the power to do that? Can we grant rights like those into the hands of these mortgagees and then turn around within a brief period of time after they have sold their bonds and the bondholders have paid their money and say, "We shall by our own final decree take from you the whole substance of this grant, leaving in the hands of the company the franchise to be a corporation and the right of way, and leaving nothing else for your mortgage but that?" Has Congress the power to do this? Does the power to declare a forfeiture reach that far? Does the power to declare a forfeiture by the Crown of England reach that far? Do we find any constitutional or legal provision and authority which reaches that far under our system of laws or jurisprudence? No, sir; we have not got it. If we establish such a power at all it will be done by this act. If that conclusive declaration is made, it will be for the first time by this act.

Mr. GEORGE. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator from Kansas to say in response to a question which I put to him that there was no mortgage upon any lands which this bill proposes to forfeit. I understood him to say so. If that be so, it seems to me that the objection raised by the Senator from Alabama is without force on that point.

Mr. MORGAN. All I can say about that is that the mortgage is upon all the lands granted in this act. How much you can take out of it I do not know.

Mr. SLATER. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Do I understand him to argue that the mortgagees got any better or larger or higher title than the grantee had by the original grant or that the permission of Congress that they might mortgage their land and corporate franchise carried with it any other grant greater than the original act gave them?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not so sure about that. It is a very doubtful question. My opinion would be that the act of 1871 authorizing the mortgage of the lands notwithstanding the fact that on the 4th of July, 1878, the road was required to be built, Congress knowing that it could not be built in that time, it must have been the intention of Congress to extend the time longer than that. You gave to them power to make a mortgage without saying when the bonds should fall due or when the mortgage should fall due. You put no restriction upon them that they should build the railroad by the 4th of July, 1878. Put the two facts together and borrow $26,000,000 of money upon them, and I should say when you were dealing with a private citizen the implied understanding in that case would not be that you should have your road completed by the 4th of July, 1878, but that some extension of the time was to be expected. That is the equitable and just view of it, to say the least.

I am not here for the purpose of deciding these questions. I do not want to be here for that purpose. I am here for the purpose of arguing them and showing how strong a case the Senator can make on his side of it, and how strong a case I can make on the other side, and to convince the Senator, as well as everybody else, that when two lawyers get up here and express opinions diametrically opposite upon this case and both are plausible, then the judge should come in and decide. My argument is that these are not questions that it is necessary for us to decide in order to do all that we lawfully can to assert and maintain the rights of the United States.

I am not trying to prove any right in favor of the Government of the United States in this argument or in favor of the claimant as being undeniably true. I am trying to show that both upon the law and the facts of this case, over the whole of it from beginning to end there is so much of doubt and uncertainty as that the Congress of the United States ought not to usurp to itself the final judicial determination upon those facts which will dispose of the property absolutely and take the matter away from the courts.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator from Alabama say that will be the effect of this bill?

Mr. MORGAN. The effect of my amendment will be——

Mr. GEORGE. But does the Senator say the effect of the bill is to settle the rights of the parties without resort to the courts?

Mr. MORGAN. Unquestionably. You can not get further than the bill goes in that direction. In further answer to the question put to me by the Senator from Mississippi, I will read from section 1 of the bill to convice him that this is the effect of the bill. That the sentence we are to pronounce by the passage of this bill is a final and conclusive sentence that nobody ever after can disturb. It may be inquired into in some collateral way in a private suit, but it can not be done in a direct suit against the Government. I will read:

> That all the lands * * * be, and the same are hereby, declared forfeited, and the title thereto resumed by the United States, and said lands restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made.

In addition to the taking of this property out of the hands of all claimants and its relegation to the public domain, this section proposes to do what we have never had the right to do—to repeal an act in the sense of expunging it. The power does not exist in the Congress of the United States of a legislative character, to say the least of it, so to affect any existing law as to expunge it from the statute-book and to give it no more effect than if it had never existed. Why, sir, the exercise of a power of that kind might be used to the utter destruction of every human right, and I do hope I shall never see the day when the Senate of the United States will consent to legislation of that kind. An act was passed twenty years ago under which rights have sprung up; can we by an act of Congress now cut down to the very root of the former act, and say that for the purpose of protecting the title to property which we take from one party and give to another this first act shall be as if it never had existed? No, Mr. President, we can not do that. That is going too far.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to suggest in the line of his argument that I never heard it asserted before that a subsequent Legislature could divest rights acquired under an act of a previous Legislature? In support of this I refer the Senator to Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, in which the doctrine, as I have stated it, is fully laid down. I speak from memory, but I am sure the decision sustains the position.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly if such a thing were possible that you could go into a Legislative Assembly and buy a public act out and out from speaker and members of both houses and bribe the governor to sign it, it is none the less a valid law.

Mr. MAXEY. The point of that case as I remember it—and I speak entirely from memory—was that an act was procured from the Legislature of the State of Georgia, and under that act property rights became vested, and a subsequent Legislature declared that that act had been fraudulently procured and that the rights of parties under that act were fraudulently obtained, and repealed the act and the rights under it. The case came to the Supreme Court of the United States and it was decided that that could not be done.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the law upon that proposition is too clear for any disputation at all, and I can not follow the committee to the extent that they have gone here in an attempt to expunge a law, and in that way to cut down all the rights that might have accrued under it back to the date of its enactment.

Mr. President, my argument has been addressed, as the Senate has seen, to the proposition that there is too much of doubt and disputation in the facts and too much uncertainty in the law of this case for us to undertake to do what the committee recommend we shall do in the passage of this bill as it is. When we come to the outside boundary and limit of our authority upon this question, it is simply this: We can make a political declaration—I call it political as contradistinguished from judicial—we can make a political declaration of the will of the Government of the United States that these lands are forfeited. In doing that we reach precisely the point and go no further than the king can go in England when he issues his prerogative writ and has his coroner to summon a jury and get a verdict of the jury which pronounces that the lands claimed by the crown are forfeited, and the effect of the declaration here is precisely what the effect of the verdict of the coroner's jury in England is in such proceeding—"office found," as it is called. Not a judicial decree to settle conclusively the right of the matter, not to touch the title in a dispute between the citizen and the Government, but merely to give the Government that legal standing with reference to the title which a private citizen would acquire who claimed the right to a return or reversion of land to him under a forfeiture for breach of condition-subsequent and entered into the possession and so united the possession with his title. What lies beyond that, in disposing of the right of property, if it is done by an act of Congress, is done by usurpation and at the expense of that feature of the Constitution of the United States which says that a man's property shall not be taken from him except by due course of law.

The Government of the United States in this case, in my opinion, ought to enter its declaration of forfeiture of these lands. I follow the committee to the whole extent that the Government ought to declare the forfeiture of all these lands that are unearned as we say—lands that are not coterminous with the constructed parts of this road. I say I follow the committee. I do it reluctantly, but I do it for the purpose of giving in this act full vigor and effect to the declaration that Congress may make upon this question. My conviction is one that I can not shake off that this company is holding that portion of the land grant between the place called the Needles, where it unites with the Southern Pacific road, to San Francisco, a belt of land lying along the coast of the Pacific Ocean, not in the good faith of an intention now, or within a reasonable time, to build that road; and believing so, I will concur in the political declaration, which is true as matter of fact, that this company have done nothing west of the point called the Needles to earn the grant.

They have not indicated by their conduct that they have not really abandoned the purpose of trying to earn the land beyond the Needles, and therefore I am willing to make this declaration that beyond that point the lands ought to be forfeited, and I will go with the committee to the eastward of that place and in the gaps and intervals, wherever they may exist, where this corporation have not built the road. I am willing also to make a declaration of like kind, though I believe it smacks considerably of injustice, and let the courts pass upon our right to do this.

When that declaration is made we should stop. Then I propose by my amendment in the next section of the bill to give jurisdiction to the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri to hear and determine all questions arising under the land-grant act and any amendments thereto, and under this act that we are now passing; for I do not wish to put the action of a preceding Congress under the inspection of a court and deny to that court the right to inspect our act also. I want the courts to ascertain how far our action has been constitutional, or how far it may have invaded the rights that we have no right to invade. I therefore give to that court in my amendment full and ample power and jurisdiction to decide between the Government of the United States and this corporation and all persons claiming under the corporation or under any law of the United States, what their rights are within this land grant.

In the next section of my amendment I make it the duty of the district attorney for the western district of Missouri, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, to file a bill in equity in the circuit court in the nature of a bill of interpleader, the complainant in which bill shall be the United States; and one of the defendants at least shall be the corporation and such other persons as that officer shall believe are the proper representatives of the actual interests, whether legal or equitable, arising under that grant and under this act of forfeiture, bring them into court, cause them to interplead, the one with the other, in the assertion of all the rights and equities and privileges that they claim under these acts, and then let the judge decide these questions. If the judge wants a jury, as sometimes is the case in issues out of chancery, let him summon a jury to decide the questions of fact when he is not willing to decide them himself.

In the next section of the amendment it is provided that those persons who are not made original parties to this suit, persons who are not necessary parties but may be proper parties, persons who may have an interest in this litigation or in this property which it would be justice and right to open the doors to allow them to present and to controvert, may come in by petition, if they choose, within twelve months from the filing of the bill. They may present before the court the nature of their claims by petition, supported by oath. Thereupon the judge shall take the petition and look it over, and if he should decide that the facts presented in that petition are necessary for the proper determination and full settlement of all the matters brought to his attention and within his jurisdiction by this law, he may admit that party to come in as a party defendant, and thereupon he is a party on the record precisely as if he had been originally sued.

So thus we give the opportunity in this amendment to whoever wishes to come in, provided the judge says he is not a mere intruder, provided he has not some private quarrel with his neighbor that he wants the jurisdiction of this court exercised to dispose of. If his case is against the Government and requires that it shall have the construction of the court upon the laws of the United States under which he claims, my amendment lets him come in to the case.

Then in the next section it is provided that the court shall have power in the case where the defendants are made such in the original suit to determine who shall pay the costs, and if the court is of opinion that the Government of the United States ought to pay them to tax them all against the Government, but in the other class of cases where men come in by petition it shall be the duty of the court to apportion the costs between the Government of the United States and the claimants in such manner as according to law and equity it may deem advisable.

That is the whole purport of my amendment, except that I would add to the end of it—if the Senator from Kansas desires it—that whatever lands remain after these decisions have been completed shall be disposed of by the Government of the United States. He says at two dollars and a half an acre; the Senator from Kentucky says a dollar and a quarter an acre, and that provision, of course, can come in. I do not mean to strike out that provision in my amendment, although I include it, because the language of the bill as reported has some things in it that I have to get rid of in order to make my amendment harmonious with the rest of the bill.

Now, about the appeal. I provide that any person after a final decree may take an appeal from the decision in this case to the Supreme Court of the United States, provided the appeal is taken within six months after the final decision. It is then provided that it must be done under the rules and regulations governing appeals in equity causes as they are now in existence, the acts of Congress, and the rules prescribed by the court to govern and regulate appeals.

Then it is provided that it shall be the duty of the Supreme Court to advance these causes upon the docket so that they may be heard, the object being, of course, to settle all this great mass of rights as speedily as can be done.

Now let me ask the Senate, would not every Senator in this body feel that he was upon more secure ground if he had the judgment of the Supreme Court or of the circuit court of the United States to stand upon, and would we ever regret that we had delayed our action in seizing this land and appropriating it to the Government of the United States until by the intervention of the courts we could have these matters settled by the judicial tribunals of the country?

Mr. President, the people of the United States are not going to look upon measures of this novel and interesting character with entire composure. When Congress reaches its hands out within the domain of the jurisdiction of the Federal judiciary and undertakes to become judge and jury and thereby touches private rights we may expect that the sensibilities of the American people, who are always awake to questions of this kind, will come back to question us with great severity as to the ground we stand upon. No, sir; let us stand upon safe ground in this matter.

I could go further in the elucidation of this matter by an examination of the provisions of the charter. I have remarked already that it was a very able charter; it covered a great deal of ground and with no doubtful words.

Now, it is contended by the lawyers, and able lawyers, too, who represented this company before the committee of the Senate and the committee of the House, it is also, I observe, in looking at the debates of the House, contended by able members of the House of Representatives, that there is no reservation in this act of the right to declare these lands forfeited to the United States. That is a broad declaration; that is a broad question, and a very important one. Precisely the same language is in the Northern Pacific grant and perhaps in other grants in this country, and it will be twenty-five or fifty years or perhaps one hundred before the Senate of the United States will have a law question to settle equal in its intrinsic importance with this question arising from this grant.

Let me state to you without debating them some of the arguments made in behalf of the railroad company and the mortgage bondholders to show that the Government of the United States never reserved in this act the right to declare these lands forfeited to itself.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If the Senator——

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me a moment. I fear there is about to be a motion for an executive session. I am anxious to say a very few words to-night if the Senator from California will yield a moment and the Senator from Alabama will permit me. I wish to say just a word or two to night before we go into executive session, upon this measure. Senators will excuse me after they have heard me I am sure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall trouble the Senate but a moment. I had intended, if I could have obtained the floor earlier, to make some general observations upon the policy of the United States in regard to its great Western lands, in view of the renewed interest that has been awakened in the public mind, and especially with regard to the great holdings that we have permitted to grow up there, whether in the hands of individuals or of great corporations; but I forbear this evening and only now speak of a matter which I had intended to introduce incidentally in my remarks.

I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-day—I invite the attention of Senators to this matter—a catalogue of citizens of the United States holding enormous estates in the Territories and in the various States, and among them I find placed the name of Senator JOHN A. LOGAN as holding 80,000 acres. I can hardly mistake when I say that the object of a statement of that kind appears to be to prejudice a gentleman whose circumstances are such that he can hardly speak for himself, though abundantly qualified, as everybody knows, to do so. I beg leave, therefore, to say that the gentleman referred to is not the owner of any such estate of land in the Territories or anywhere else. He is only the owner of the land upon which his father died and which he purchased from the other heirs, and to which he has added a little in his own State of Illinois, and he has not the good or ill fortune to be the owner of the 80,000 acres referred to.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to allude to myself, but I will say to the Senator so that he may be correct about it that the statement is utterly false. I do not think it material to go into the matter, for I do not propose to give a schedule of my property to anybody. I will say, however, that what property I do own is in the State of Illinois. I do own some tracts of land outside of town lots, all of which put together would not amount to one hundredth part of what is alleged.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Senator from Alabama would prefer to conclude his speech to-morrow morning. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator yield to me that I may present an amendment to the bill?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. BLAIR. Being opposed to this bill in its present form, and feeling obliged to oppose it unless it shall be radically amended, I desire at this time to offer a substitute for the whole bill which I wish to have printed, and which I shall press on the attention of the Senate unless the bill itself should be substantially amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the amendment which I offered to-day may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the amendment offered by him be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from California allow me to make a motion? The House, as is well known to the Senate, has amended the bill providing for the count of the Presidential vote by substituting an entirely different scheme. I desire to move that the Senate nonconcur and ask for a conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House amendment has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HOAR. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be necessary for the Senate to discharge the committee before the proposed action can be had.

Mr. HOAR. There has not been a meeting of the committee since the action of the House; but I am so confident that the committee will be unanimous that I will ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 25) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, and that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask a conference. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 27, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDUSTRIAL HOME SCHOOL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HORR. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time Senate bill 1519, to regulate the powers and duties of the board of trustees of the Industrial Home of the District of Columbia in respect to infant wards and scholars, and for other purposes. The bill passed the Senate unanimously, and simply proposes to give to the trustees of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia the right to take charge of children, so that the courts can make them guardians of the children that are left with them. I think there will be no objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That when a guardian or parent of an infant shall, by an instrument in writing duly signed, executed, and acknowledged before a notary public of the District of Columbia or the clerk of the supreme court of said District, surrender said infant to the custody of the board of trustees of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia, the said undertaking shall be binding upon said parent or guardian for the time named in said undertaking as the time during which the said infant is to remain in the custody of the said board.

SEC. 2. That upon application or consent of the president of the said board of managers of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia, the supreme court of the District of Columbia may appoint the said corporation to be the guardian of an infant ward, and the said corporation may take and exercise said guardianship so far as relates to the person of such ward to the same extent and under the same obligations and conditions as is now provided by law in the case of natural persons.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will ask if this bill or one similar to it has been considered by the appropriate committee of the House?

Mr. HORR. It has not been; but the bill has been considered in the Senate and passed unanimously by that body.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understood the first section of the bill correctly as it was read, I would call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] to the fact that it provides for the surrender of infants to this institution by the guardian or parent.

Mr. HORR. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not be rather a stretch of power to confer upon the guardian the right to surrender an infant to the control of this institution? If the guardian is to act at all, should it not be with the consent of the parent, if there be one?

Mr. HORR. If I understand the bill that is what it provides. If there are parents, then the surrender must be by the parents; and if not, then by the guardian.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the first section be again read.

The first section of the bill was again read.

Mr. HORR. I do not think that section is subject to the objection which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has suggested.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is to say, according to that section, the assent of the father or mother is not required when the act is done by the guardian. Now, many instances might arise when a guardian ought not to be permitted to surrender a child to this institution for an indefinite period without the consent of the father or mother.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has been read?

Mr. TUCKER. I think this bill had better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and therefore I object to its present consideration.

Mr. HORR. And I ask that it be referred with leave to the committee to report it back at any time.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that the bill just read be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with leave to report it back at any time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with power to report the same back at any time.

JOHN W. MARTIN.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5452) for the relief of John W. Martin and that the same be considered in the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John W. Martin, of Brookhaven, Miss., the sum of $300, for services actually rendered as postmaster at Brookhaven, Miss., by authority of the military commandant, from July, 1865, to July, 1866.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill which has just been read and to considering the same in the House at this time?

There was no objection.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to amend the bill by striking out "$300" and inserting in lieu thereof "$700."

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we had better hear the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. STORM) was read, as follows:

The facts in this case, as disclosed by the papers, are as follows:

That on the 24th day of June, 1865, the said John W. Martin was appointed postmaster at Brookhaven, Miss., by Maj. Alfred Hodsden, commanding the post at that place. The records of the Adjutant-General's Office show the appointment of said Martin. The records also show that the fact of his appointment was duly communicated by Major-General Osterhaus to the Postmaster-General of the United States. Twenty-one leading and respectable citizens of Brookhaven certify that Dr. Martin discharged in a very acceptable manner the duties of postmaster at that place for a period of twelve months.

The Post-Office Department refused to pay the claim for service because it was a military appointment and did not come within the jurisdiction of that Department.

The claimant trusted his claim to members of Congress to look after several years ago, but through carelessness important papers were lost, and the claim was neglected by no fault of the claimant.

The claimant fixes his demand at $1,300. He does not state that that amount was fixed by the Government as his compensation. There is a statement made by one witness that the services were worth $1,300. But the books of the Post-Office Department show that for the two subsequent years, 1867 and 1868, the pay of the postmaster at Brookhaven was fixed at $300. There being nothing in the case to show that the service for the year 1865-'66 was worth more than for subsequent years, the committee is of the opinion that $300 would be full pay.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as a substitute for House bill No. 3266, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] should go beyond the recommendation made in the report of the committee, which is to pay this man the sum of $300 for his services as postmaster.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The committee made their report without full knowledge of all the facts, some of which have been since supplied. I will briefly state them if it is the wish of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the House that I should do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to know what the facts are.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I can state them very briefly in the presence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] who prepared the report in this case, and he can testify to the correctness of my statement.

This claim is for services rendered nineteen years ago. Upon investigation the committee ascertained that the claim was just. The pay of the postmaster at Brookhaven for the two years immediately subsequent to the war was only $300. The rate of compensation had not then been adjusted to the changed condition of affairs. But three years later when the State had been readmitted into the Union, so to speak, the compensation, as shown by records of the Post-Office Department, was fixed at $1,300, with an allowance of $300 for office rent, making $1,600. Now, Mr. Speaker, in a spirit of compromise, and in order to settle this long-standing claim, which is entirely just, as ascertained by the investigation of the committee, I propose that Mr. Martin be allowed $700, about half the sum claimed in the original bill. I hope there will be no objection. It is a strictly just claim.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman from Mississippi move to allow $700, instead of $300 as reported by the committee?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes, sir; that is my motion.

Mr. DINGLEY. The committee, I understand, reports in favor of allowing only $300.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Only $300; but that report is based upon an imperfect statement of facts, which have since been supplied.

Mr. DINGLEY. The amount allowed at that office by the Postmaster-General for the year subsequent to the period named in the bill was only $300.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes, sir. But the third year after that time the compensation was fixed at $1,350, and the allowance now, although the population of the place has not largely increased, is $1,650, including $300 for office rent. My amendment provides that the postmaster who performed this service shall be paid only $700.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BARKSDALE, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 61, noes 20.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Govment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. A number of gentlemen on the floor desire that the bill to grant pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, which has been returned from the Senate, with amendments, and is now on the Speaker's table, be printed, with the amendments, for the use of members. If there be no objection, the order which the Chair directs the Clerk to read will be entered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That House bill 5667 "granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and for other purposes," on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments, be printed.

There being no objection, the order was adopted.

Mr. McMILLIN. I demand the regular order.

GULF, COLORADO AND SANTA FÉ RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WELLBORN. I rise to a privileged question. I send to the desk the report of a conference committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (3961) entitled "An act to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with the following amendment:

"In lieu of the Senate amendment insert the following: 'The line to be located in sections of twenty-five miles each; and before work is begun on any section the line thereof is to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered respectively 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with the following amendment:

"Amend Senate amendment 8 by inserting after the word 'construction' the word 'operation,' and adding after the word 'interior' the words 'in accordance with said intercourse laws.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

OLIN WELLBORN,
RICE A. PIERCE,
B. W. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOSEPH E. BROWN,
PHILETUS SAWYER,
J. R. HAWLEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the House conferees, accompanying the report, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT.

Under the Senate amendment numbered 1, the whole line of the road is to be permanently located and approved by the Secretary of the Interior before work is begun on any portion of it. Under the amendment, as changed by the committee of conference, the company is to locate its road by sections of twenty-five miles, and each section is to be approved before work is begun on the section.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments numbered, respectively, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7.

Under the eighth Senate amendment "the officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction and management of said road and telegraph and telephone lines shall be allowed to reside while so engaged upon said right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior." The first amendment reported by the conference committee to the eighth Senate amendment simply makes specific what the Senate amendment was doubtless designed to effect, by expressly providing that all officers, servants, and employés of the railroad shall be permitted to reside on the right of way who are necessary to the construction, operation, and management of the road.

The second amendment reported by the conference committee to the eighth Senate amendment limits the regulations which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make to such regulations as are in accordance with the intercourse laws of Congress.

OLIN WELLBORN,
RICE A. PIERCE,
B. W. PERKINS,
House Conferees.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the object of agreeing to the location of this road by sections of twenty-five miles, each subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, instead of the whole line, as originally proposed?

Mr. WELLBORN. The bill, as it originally passed the House, contained no provision whatever requiring the Interior Department to approve of the line. When it went to the Senate, however, it was amended, requiring the Secretary of the Interior to approve the whole line across the Territory before work should be begun on any portion of it. That requirement is an impracticable one, to locate a whole line, two hundred and fifty miles, permanently and definitely, before the work should be begun on any portion of it. The committee of conference, therefore, on investigation of the matter, determined to require the location in sections of twenty-five miles, each section to be approved before the work should be begun. That is all there is of the amendment.

Mr. BLAND. Has there been any change in the provision reserving the power of regulation to Congress?

Mr. WELLBORN. There has not been any change.

The report was adopted.

Mr. WELLBORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HANCOCK. I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6094) "making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$300,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert: "Provided, That from and after July 1, 1884, agents for the payment of pensions shall receive only $12.50 for each one hundred vouchers, or at that rate for a fraction of one hundred, prepared and paid by any agent in excess of 4,000 vouchers per annum;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendments insert the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases,' approved June 20, 1878, is hereby repealed; Provided, however, That the rights of the parties shall not be abridged or affected as to contracts in pending cases, as provided for in said act; but such contracts shall be deemed to be and remain in full force and virtue, and shall be recognized as contemplated by said act.

"SEC. 2. That sections 4768, 4769, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes are hereby made applicable also to all cases hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions, and to all cases so filed since June 20, 1878, and which have not been heretofore allowed, except as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 3. That section 4785 of the Revised Statutes is hereby re-enacted and amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 4785. No agent or attorney or other person shall demand or receive any other compensation for his services in prosecuting a claim for pension or bounty land than such as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct to be paid to him, not exceeding $25; nor shall such agent, attorney, or other person demand or receive such compensation, in whole or in part, until such pension or bounty-land claim shall be allowed: Provided, That in all claims allowed since June 30, 1878, where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that the fee of $10, or any part thereof, has not been paid, he shall cause the same to be deducted from the pension, and the pension agent to pay the same to the recognized attorney.'

"SEC. 4. That section 4786 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 4786. The agent or attorney of record in the prosecution of the case may cause to be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions, duplicate articles of agreement, without additional cost to the claimant, setting forth the fee agreed upon by the parties, which agreement shall be executed in the presence of and certified by some officer competent to administer oaths. In all cases where application is made for pension or bounty land, and no agreement is filed with the Commissioner as herein provided, the fee shall be $10 and no more. And such articles of agreement as may hereafter be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions are not authorized, nor will they be recognized except in claims for original pensions, claims for increase of pension on account of a new disability, in claims for restoration where a pensioner's name has been or may hereafter be dropped from the pension-rolls on testimony taken by a special examiner, showing that the disability or cause of death, on account of which the pension was allowed, did not originate in the line of duty, and in cases of dependent relatives whose names have been or may hereafter be dropped from the rolls on like testimony, upon the ground of non-dependence, and in such other cases of difficulty and trouble as the Commissioner of Pensions may see fit to recognize them: Provided, That no greater fee than $10 shall be demanded, received, or allowed in any claim for pension or bounty land granted by special act of Congress, nor in any claim for increase of pension on account of the increase of the disability for which the pension had been allowed: And provided further, That no fee shall be demanded, received, or allowed in any claim for arrears of pension or arrears of increase of pension allowed by any act of Congress passed subsequent to the date of the allowance of the original claims in which such arrears of pension or of increase of pension may be allowed.'

"The articles of agreement herein provided for shall be in substance as follows, to wit:

"'ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

And if in the adjudication of any claim for pension in which articles of agreement have been or may hereafter be filed it shall appear that the claimant had, prior to the execution thereof, paid to the attorney any sum for his services in such claim, and the amount so paid is not stipulated therein, then every such claim shall be adjudicated in the same manner as though no article of agreement had been filed, deducting from the fee of $10 allowed by law such sum as claimant shall show that he has paid to his said attorney.

R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of pensions, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action recommended on each amendment in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment numbered 1: Inserts the words "estimated at sixty-six million dollars" in connection with the reappropriation of unexpended balances to be available during the fiscal year 1885.

On amendments numbered 2 and 3: Appropriates $300,000 for salaries, fees, rent, fuel, lights, and postage for pension agents; fixes the fees for preparing vouchers at $12.50 per hundred, and strikes out provision to reduce the pension agencies from eighteen to twelve.

On amendments 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8: Inserts the matter which is set forth in full in the conference report in lieu of sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the bill as it passed the House.

The bill as agreed upon appropriates $20,810,000, and reappropriates an unexpended balance estimated at $66,000,000.

JOHN HANCOCK,
JOHN F. FOLLETT,
W. D. WASHBURN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. FORNEY, the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table, the amendments of the Senate ordered to be printed, and the bill and amendments referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House now to proceed to the consideration of the contested-election case growing out of the resolution relating to the election of Thomas G. Skinner, from the first district of North Carolina.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, this being private bill day, and as it may possibly be the last private bill day we will have during the remainder of the session, I must raise the question of consideration.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow the remark to be made, I will state that I propose to call the previous question in this case at the end of two hours' debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to consider the election case?

Mr. SINGLETON. I will give notice if that fails I shall again attempt to call up for consideration the bill declaring the forfeiture of the Northern Pacific land grant.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The question was taken on the motion to proceed with the election case.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 73.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, and Mr. MCMILLIN were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 104.

So the House refused to proceed with the consideration of the election case.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SCALES. I rise to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the call of committees for reports of a private nature is in order. The gentleman from Mississippi addressed the Chair.

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not propose to antagonize private business.

Mr. HENLEY. I move now to proceed with the consideration of business on the House Caledar for the purpose of taking up the forfeiture of the Northern Pacific land grant.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by dispensing with private business.

Mr. HENLEY. I move to dispense with private business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the motion: The gentleman from California proposes to dispense with the consideration of private business for to-day.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. Pending the motion to dispense with private business, I desire to present a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 6861, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 11, 12, 36, and 38.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, 48, 49, and 50, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$12,150,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "That the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint on the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General as many post quartermaster-sergeants, not to exceed eighty, as he may deem necessary for the interests of the service, said sergeants to be selected by examination from the most competent enlisted men of the Army who have served at least four years, and whose character and education shall fit them to take charge of public property and to act as clerks and assistants to the post and other quartermasters. Said post quartermaster-sergeants shall so far as practicable perform the duties of storekeepers and clerks in lieu of citizen employés. The post quartermaster-sergeants shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War, and shall receive for their services the same pay and allowances as ordnance-sergeants;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 10, after the word "advertisements," in lines 8 and 9 of the bill, insert "except in cases of extreme emergency;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

At the end of the amended paragraph, after the word "Register," insert the following:

"Provided, That the medical officers of the Army and contract surgeons shall, whenever practicable, attend the families of the officers and soldiers free of charge."

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendment numbered 35 the conference committee is unable to agree.

The statement accompanying the report is as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. On amendment numbered 1: Provides for an additional allowance of $1,000 to the officer in command of the military prison at Fort Leavenworth.

On amendments numbered 2, 25, 29, 41: Restores to the bill the provision for the appointment of post quartermaster-sergeants, limiting their number to eighty, and fixing their compensation and allowances at the same as given to ordnance-sergeants. On amendment numbered 3: Appropriates $12,150,000 for pay of the Army.

of major; and no more appointments of paymasters shall be made in the Pay Department until the number shall be reduced below twenty-nine majors, and thereafter the number of officers in the Pay Department shall not exceed thirty-five: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to change the present relative rank of any officer now in the Pay Corps: And provided further, That section 1225 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the detail of officers of the Army to act as presidents, superintendents, and professors of colleges and universities, be so amended as to read 'but the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed forty at any time,' instead of thirty, as now provided by act of July 5, 1876, amendatory of said section."

On amendments numbered 11 and 12: Retains in the bill as it passed the House the provision for sales of subsistence supplies to officers and men at cost prices, and strikes out the following: "That the purchases made by the commissary of cadets at West Point, from the funds appropriated for the pay of cadets, shall, as far as practicable, be made upon public advertisement, as for other Army supplies, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may adopt."

On amendments numbered 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24: Applies to the Commissary Department the same regulations contained in the House bill governing the purchase of supplies by the Quartermaster's Department, and makes verbal corrections in the text of the bill.

On amendments 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, and 32: Makes verbal corrections in the bill, provides for interment of officers killed in action or who die at military posts on the frontiers, and provides for extra-duty pay to clerks at army, division, and department headquarters at 50 cents per day.

On amendments 33 and 34: Makes verbal corrections in the text of the bill.

On amendments 36, 37, 38, 39, and 40: Strikes out the words "hire of" in the provision for barracks and quarters; also the words "for commutation of quarters for general-service men;" leaves in the bill the provision that no expenditure exceeding $500 shall be made on any building or military post without the approval of the Secretary of War; and provides that the civilians employed under the Quartermaster's Department shall include those heretofore paid out of the funds appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, army transportation, clothing, and camp and garrison equipage.

On amendment numbered 42: Strikes out the following: For quarters for the non-commissioned staff of the Army, as sergeant-major, quartermaster-sergeants, commissary-sergeants, ordnance-sergeants, veterinary surgeons, and chief musicians and chief trumpeters, and principal musicians, $25,000."

On amendment numbered 43: Appropriates $100,000 for construction and repair of hospitals.

On amendment numbered 44: Strikes out the following: "For construction of quarters adjacent to the hospitals for hospital stewards, as recommended by the Surgeon-General of the Army, including the pay of enlisted men employed on extra duty in the same, $15,000."

On amendments 45 and 46: Appropriates $225,000 for the Medical Department, and limits the expenditure therein to $36,000 for civilian employés and provides that medical officers of the Army shall attend the families of the officers and soldiers free of charge.

On amendment 47: Strikes out the sum of $15,000 for field steel guns.

On amendments 48, 49, and 50: Makes the last paragraph of the bill read as follows:

"That hereafter all officers, agents, or other persons receiving public moneys appropriated by this or any subsequent Army appropriation act shall account for the disbursement thereof according to the several and distinct items of appropriation expressed in such act."

On amendment numbered 35: Which strikes out that portion of the bill fixing the compensation to railroads that received aid from the Government in addition to land grants by loan or guarantee of bonds for the transportation of the property or troops of the United States at not exceeding 50 per cent. of the amount paid by private parties for the same kind of service, the committee of conference is unable to agree.

The bill as far as agreed upon appropriates $24,454,450, being $100,000 less than as it passed the Senate and $210,000 more than as it passed the House. It is $226,800 less than the law for the current year and $2,355,653.91 less than the estimates.

WM. H. FORNEY,
R. W. TOWNSHEND,
J. WARREN KEIFER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House agree to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. FORNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35.

Mr. KEIFER. And ask for a further committee of conference.

Mr. FORNEY. Perhaps the Senate may recede.

The SPEAKER. It is entirely competent for the House to ask for a committee of conference at this time.

Mr. KEIFER. I think we should.

Mr. FORNEY. Very well; I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment No. 35 and ask for a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FORNEY, Mr. TOWNSHEND, and Mr. KEIFER.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion made by the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] to dispense with the consideration of private business. This motion requires a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. KEIFER. I presume that would not dispense with the evening session for pension bills.

The SPEAKER. It would not.

The question being taken on Mr. HENLEY's motion, there were—ayes 47, noes 70.

So (further count not being called for and two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the consideration of private business was not dispensed with.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the unfinished private business. There are various reports made by the Committee of the Whole which ought to be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that those reports are not unfinished business in the proper sense of the term, because the House itself has not entered on the consideration of them. They could only now be taken up by unanimous consent, but they will come up regularly as soon as the Committee of the Whole rises, if the House should go into committee, as reports from the Committee of the Whole in their regular order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

SILAS Q. HOWE.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole resumes the consideration of the Private Calendar. The Clerk will read the pending bill.

The Clerk read the title of the pending bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 329) for the relief of Silas Q. Howe, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill and report have already been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it would be well to read the report again.

The report, which has already been printed in the RECORD, was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. When this bill was before the Committee of the Whole when the House was last in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, I mentioned the fact that my colleague from Indiana, General BROWNE, was more familiar with the facts of the case than perhaps any other gentleman. I see he is now present and I am glad to yield the floor to him.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the committee will give me its attention for three minutes I think I can make it understand the facts in this case. I had to do with it while I was acting as the attorney of the United States for the district of Indiana. I prosecuted the case in the courts of that State against Pate & Co. There was a trial by jury and a failure on the part of the jury to agree; and that failure originated because of a misapprehension on the part of both the jury and the counsel as to the testimony of one of the important witnesses for the Government.

The case was this: Under the revenue law then, and I suppose it is the same now, distillers are required to keep what are known as distillery books, in which is kept a record not only of all material furnished them, &c., but of all the spirits distilled, and to state when and to whom distilled spirits were shipped; and this book of the distiller is kept constantly open for investigation on the part of the revenue officers. A revenue detective examining the books found that this company reported to have manufactured within a certain term a certain quantity of distilled spirits. I do not remember now whether that term embraced a whole year or less than a year. The detective, having ascertained the amount of spirits distilled according to the distillers' books, then proceeded to make investigations in Louisville and other places, and found that during this period this company had put into the market spirits in excess of those reported to have been manufactured amounting to something over 9,000 gallons, if I remember correctly.

The Government at once assumed that as more spirits had been sold within the period than the distillers had reported as having been manufactured by them this excess of sale over the amount distilled was fraudulent. The Government thereupon assessed the distillers, and under the law they were compelled to pay the amount or subject their distillery to seizure. They could not contest the fact in advance of payment. I am not certain whether the distillery was actually seized or not. It was either seized or they were compelled to pay under protest.

The case went into the courts, as I have stated. Ten, I think, of the twelve jurors were in favor of an acquittal. It was ascertained subsequent to the mistrial that the excess of sales was accounted for in this way: Pate & Co. had been for some time engaged in the business of distilling, and they had on hand prior to the time mentioned a large quantity of what is known as free whisky—that is, a large quantity of whisky on which taxes had been paid—in fact, they had not only sold during this period the spirits they had manufactured and paid taxes upon within the period, but other spirits that had been before that time manufactured on which they had paid their taxes. This was conclusively established by the testimony of the witnesses for the United States.

It was so clearly, unmistakably proved that, under the direction of the court, the Government abandoned the prosecution. I conferred with the judge of the court who had heard the testimony, and upon his direction I dismissed the case. The court had no doubt then, and I have never entertained a doubt for a moment since, that Pate & Co. had been compelled to pay tax twice on the amount of spirits covered by this bill. They are not only entitled to recover it back, but it ought to have been returned to them long ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that upon the facts now before the committee there will be no objection to laying this bill aside to be reported favorably to the House, and I make that motion.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before that question is put I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that here is a case involving over $19,000, a whisky claim that has been delayed for seventeen years. After the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], for whose return this case has been waiting, lo! these many days, because the gentleman from the third district of Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] knew nothing about it when it was taken up the last time the Private Calendar was considered, because the gentleman from the Committee of Ways and Means who reported the case was absent and the other members of the Committee of Ways and Means knew nothing about it, I wish to state that those were the reasons why in the past I conceived it to be my duty to oppose the passage of this bill.

After the clear statement of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who was the United States attorney, and who has stated that the testimony of the witnesses for the Government showed conclusively that these men were falsely reported, I desire to call the attention of the committee to some recent legislation on this whisky business. I refer to the provision which was passed here under the lead of my colleague [Mr. THOMPSON], and I am glad to see him present, allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint storekeepers and gaugers for several counties and requiring the small distillers to bring their spirits to one special bonded warehouse. That leaves it to some unscrupulous prowling revenue agent, under the leadership of some politician like the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the late Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the lead of some man high in internal-revenue service, to require a man of large means and good credit, as Mr. Pate is shown to have been, as the distinguished gentleman who has just taken his seat states he was, a man totally innocent—to allow an unscrupulous agent to require that man to go into the Federal courts.

Now, I ask my colleague, whether, under the operation of his bill which we passed a few days ago, the small distillers will not under the system of red tape and oppression and dictatorship of such corrupt officials be utterly obliterated, and good men, who, though not of great wealth, still possess means and good credit even higher than the credit of Mr. Pate was, will be compelled to break up their business?

This bill shows, to my mind, more conclusively than ever that the passage of the bill recently pressed through by my colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] is but the fastening of another link, but another tightening of the chain which will enable the grand whisky monopoly, which now has 100,000,000 gallons in bond, to crush out all the smaller distillers upon the plea that they will eventually pay the tax on the whisky they have in bond. Yet we all know that under the Carlisle bill of 1880 they are allowed seven and one-half gallons of leakage on each cask of forty gallons. And under the law of 1878 they have three years' time within which to pay the tax, and at the expiration of those three years they can ship their old whisky abroad without paying any tax upon it and put new whisky in bond in place of it.

The result is that these men—with 100,000,000 gallons of whisky in bonded Government warehouses for which the people are taxed only $5,000,000 for the purpose of paying these unscrupulous prowling revenue agents; these whisky monopolists; this whisky ring, without paying any revenue—are enabled to crush out the smaller distilleries and pile up in the bonded warehouses an unlimited supply of whisky, and when the time comes that the tax is wiped out, then this whisky ring will have on hand a large quantity of aged whisky, while the Government will lose all the tax upon it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Would it be in order, Mr. Chairman, to return now to the consideration of the Pate bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. On several occasions heretofore bills have been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, have been laid aside to be reported favorably to the House, have been reported to the House, and are yet undisposed of. I think we ought to dispose of these bills before we crowd any more into the House for consideration. I therefore move that the committee now rise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that motion. By unanimous consent an order of the House was made that to-day at 1 o'clock we should take a vote on the forfeiture land-grant bill which was under discussion yesterday. We can take up and dispose of one or two bills in Committee of the Whole before that time arrives. I sympathize with the gentleman in the object he seeks to accomplish and will do all I can to aid him to accomplish it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well; I will withdraw the motion with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, by order of the House, this Committee of the Whole must rise at 1 o'clock so that a particular bill may be taken up in the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my motion.

HIRAM JOHNSON AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1477) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons therein named the several sums of money herein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the indemnity for which it was levied and collected.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that this bill be passed over, and that we proceed to the consideration of the next bill on the Private Calendar. A bill embracing the same subject-matter as House bill No. 1477 has been heretofore disposed of in the Committee of the Whole and is now awaiting the action of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill can not be laid aside informally except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object. I think we had better take up these claims in their regular order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will again state, for the information of the gentleman from Kentucky, that a bill covering the same subject-matter as House bill No. 1477 has been disposed of heretofore in Committee of the Whole and is now awaiting the action of the House. I presume that bill will be disposed of to-day.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this subject has been acted on already in committee?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It has been; and I desire that this bill be passed over informally until action shall be had in the House on a similar bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I withdraw my objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this bill will be laid aside informally.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 130) to confirm a certain private land claim in New Mexico.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

MARCOS RADICH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4381) for the relief of Marcos Radich.

Mr. STORM. The Senate bill similar to this was passed some two months ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill, then, should be reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid on the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

WILLIAM H. DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4382) for the relief of William H. Davis.

Mr. GEDDES. By an arrangement with parties interested in this bill it has been agreed that it be passed over informally for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

JANE M. GOODALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the petition of Jane M. Goodall, reported adversely from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that this matter be passed over informally.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is a long report on this case, and it is adverse.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This is a matter which, if considered, must cause some controversy. As there is a special order in the House at 1 o'clock, and it is now about that time, I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Before putting the question the Chair will state the position of the pending matter, the petition of Jane Goodall. The objection of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] to passing over the matter informally is pending.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And I have called for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. Meanwhile, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] moves that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report favorably a bill (H. R. 329) for the relief of Silas Q. Howe, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co., with a recommendation that it lie on the table, and a bill (H. R. 4381) for the relief of Marcos Radich.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege affecting the proceedings of the House. I send to the Clerk's desk this morning's National Republican, and ask for the reading of so much as relates to the bill we are now about to vote upon; and I shall ask the House to take such action as in its judgment may seem fit under the circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky states that he rises to a question of privilege, and sends an article to the desk to be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. OATES. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what the matter is until it is read. The gentleman from Kentucky states he rises to a question of privilege affecting the integrity of the proceedings of the House. If it be such a question of course it is a matter of privilege under the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

BACKBONE LAND GRANT—A LETTER FROM E. JOHN ELLIS THAT WILL BEAR AN EXPLANATION—CHAIRMAN BARNUM'S CONNECTION WITH THIS UNPLEASANT BUSINESS.

The unsavory Backbone land-grant matter came up in the House yesterday, and a bill to forfeit the grant was defeated by a vote of 77 for to 121 against. The grant embraces about 1,492,000 acres of land, valued at something like $5,000,000. There has been a scandal attached to this grant from the first. The grant was voted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg (the Backbone) Railroad Company about the same time the Texas Pacific concession went through Congress.

W. H. Barnum, of "seven-mule" fame, was on the House Railroad Committee at that time, and president of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railway Company. This circumstance is merely mentioned as a coincidence. In 1881 the Backbone company, through W. H. Barnum, its president, and his son, W. M. Barnum, transferred the grant to the New Orleans Pacific (now a part of the Texas Pacific) receiving, according to common report, a third interest in a line of railroad to be built over substantially the same route laid out by the Backbone. Backbone land-grant bonds to the nominal value of $5,000,000 were subsequently provided for by the purchasers at 20 cents on the dollar, but not without a row.

It has been charged repeatedly that a large quantity of these land-grant bonds had found their way into the hands of Congressmen, and that a settlement for the redemption of the bonds was only reached as the consequence of threatened exposure.

Representative E. JOHN ELLIS, of Louisiana, has led the fight against the forfeiture of the grant at this session of Congress, and, as the vote shows, has done good work. Rival lobbies have been laboring industriously in this matter, one for and the other against the passage of the forfeiting bill.

Capt. J. A. George, whose name has been mixed up in this deal for years, visited this office last evening and produced the following letter, which he said had been written him by Mr. ELLIS, and which would seem to indicate that the Louisiana Congressman had knowledge of crookedness in connection with the scheme he now champions, which his compeers and the country might wish to hear about:

HOFFMAN HOUSE, NEW YORK, November 7, 1881.

MY DEAR CAPTAIN: Your favor of the 5th instant was received yesterday. I gave your letters, demand, &c., to Mr. B. for his consideration. He promised me an engagement last Friday week, and I failed to keep it. A few days after he went home to Connecticut, sick. I have been very busy with my own affairs and shall leave in a day or two for New Orleans. From what I learn, though, affairs are in a hell of a muddle through some parties who bought some Backbone stock honestly, and through some other parties who were in Congress and the Senate when the bill was passed, and who represent stock that was paid as bribes.

As the road is now an assured fact I care but little about the matter, and would, above all things, delight to see a rigid and close investigation; and if they do not spoil the chance by settlement I shall move an investigation in December. If they settle, of course they will all swear one way. If they don't settle, then we might get some truth, and in that case you and Newell would be of valuable assistance. I am only sorry for Mr. Wheelock.

I trust you and Colonel Newell will get your honest dues. I suppose Mr. B. will give you direct answer as soon he is well. But from the shape of things I think there will be no settlement at all, but that a devil of a row will be kicked up, and that when Congress meets that resolution of final forfeiture will be passed. I shall leave here in a day or two for home.

Very truly, yours,

E. JOHN ELLIS.

To Capt. J. A. GEORGE.

Mr. ELLIS might do his country a service by rising in his seat to-day and telling what he knows about the "Backbone" scheme, and give up his proof, if he has any, of the corruption he referred to in the above letter.

Mr. Barnum, chairman of the Democratic national committee, might also make a statement in this connection. It would be interesting to know whether he still holds an interest in the "Backbone," and whether his recent visit to Washington had anything to do with the action of the House; also, whether he is the Mr. B. referred to in Mr. ELLIS's letter. There are several other things that might prove of interest in this business if both sides could be induced to talk.

The SPEAKER. Upon what ground does the gentleman claim this is a matter of privilege?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I claim in view of the fact we are about to vote on the Backbone land grant, in view of the fact that report No. 31, from which I read a short extract yesterday showing the whole proceeding by which this land grant, or land grab I should say, was secured from Congress. It strikes me, sir, in view of the debate and the dilatory proceedings indulged in here some time ago, when we were about to get this forfeiture up, and which has delayed this matter from time to time—I say it does strike me, Mr. Speaker, we are about to act hastily in the matter, and that the full investigation of the facts connected with this land grant or land grab from beginning to end should be made by a committee of this House.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman has not moved for a committee. And, besides, if he did it would not be a matter of privilege. It simply appears from the letter read that the writer of it believed, or had an impression at least, there had been some improper means employed to procure the original grant in a previous Congress. In that letter——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman who wrote it is a member of this House.

The SPEAKER. But there is nothing to show that the gentleman who wrote it has been guilty of improper conduct. On the contrary, that gentleman stated that in a certain contingency he would move an investigation as to what had been done in a previous Congress.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And that is exactly why I am asking that something should be done—that the very thing he asks be done should now be done. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides no matter of privilege has been presented whatever. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. MOULTON. What has been read should not be permitted to go into the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the Clerk to read Rule IX.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE IX.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that this letter, in connection with the bill we are about to vote on at 1 o'clock, does affect the dignity and integrity of the proceedings of this House.

The SPEAKER. How? That is what the Chair desires the gentleman to state.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have had the letter read for that purpose, and if the Chair does not see it I can not help him. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That letter seems to relate entirely to matters which transpired in a previous Congress, so far as the Chair understands it from the reading at the desk. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ELLIS. I regret the gentlemen who are endeavoring to forfeit this land grant should have been driven by stress of weather to the poor expedient of directing a personal attack upon me. My attention was called to it very early this morning. I was somewhat nettled. I put myself in consultation with a valued friend upon whose honor and courage I can rely, and he wrote for me the following, which I will read:

"Mr. Speaker, while I do not desire to interrupt the vote on this question by any matters personal to myself arising from the publication of a letter in this morning's National Republican purporting to have been written by myself, and which letter I pronounce to be materially altered and garbled to suit the purposes of the publisher thereof, I desire now to state that at an early day I shall claim from the House, as a matter of personal privilege, the opportunity to expose the animus, the falsity, and the malignity of the unwarranted innuendoes directed against myself in the publication alluded to, which are intended to warp and bias the judgment of this House upon a question purely of law and equity.

"All that I can say now is that this is the last vindictive thrust of a professional black-mailer, whose baffled greed and disappointed avarice have directed this blow at me, whose unfortunate connection with him originated in a desire to do him a kindness, I at that time being unware of his real character and supposing him to be an honest man." [Great applause.]

BACKBONE RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House the vote will now be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 5682) to repeal section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1871, and to declare the forfeiture of the land grant therein made, and for other purposes, was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the House should decide to reconsider the vote by which the Backbone Railroad land-grant bill failed to pass what then would be the status of the matter in the House?

The SPEAKER. If the House should reconsider the vote the question then would be, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And it would be open to debate as before?

The SPEAKER. It would; and it has always been held when a vote has been reconsidered it comes before the House divested of the operation of the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. The question is to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 115, not voting 85; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object.

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting on the proposition.

Mr. CLAY. I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. HURD. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no" on this proposition.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. RUSSELL, until further notice.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, with Mr. BAYNE, until further notice.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. STEELE, until further notice.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. BARR, until further notice.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE, until further notice.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. CULLEN, until further notice.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. CALKINS, until further notice.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH, until further notice.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. BARR, until further notice.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. KETCHAM, until June 30.

Mr. LAMB with Mr. LONG, until June 28.

Mr. CURTIN with Mr. LYMAN, until June 28.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. MURPHY, on this vote.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I am announced as being paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LONG. That is a mistake; the gentleman from Massachusetts is paired with Mr. MATSON, of Indiana.

Mr. HOPKINS. I notice that my pair has not been read. I was informed that I had been paired, and hence refrained from voting. I ask now to record my vote.

Mr. NEECE. I was paired on this bill with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. WARNER, but I notice by the reading of the pairs that he has been paired with somebody else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Clerk has not concluded the reading of the pairs as yet.

The following additional pairs were read:

Mr. BUDD with Mr. HUTCHINS, on this vote.

Mr. MATSON with Mr. LONG, for this day.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, with Mr. SPRINGER, for this day.

Mr. HEPBURN with Mr. COOK, for this day.

Mr. ROSECRANS with Mr. RYAN, for this day.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. HOUK, for this day.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. KING, on this vote. Mr. KING would vote "ay," Mr. CAMPBELL "no."

Mr. HANBACK with Mr. SNYDER, on this vote.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now ask leave to record my vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. HOPKINS, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. NEECE, state that, believing themselves to be paired upon this vote, they did not answer when their names were called. If there be no objection they will be allowed to cast their vote.

There was no objection.

Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey. A pair was read for me with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. I desire to say that he left me free to vote on questions not political in their nature. I do not consider this such a question, and have therefore voted.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We have a number of private bills—bills affording relief in individual cases—that ought to be disposed of. The bill the title of which has just been read has stood in the way of such action for several weeks. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until next Friday, in order to dispose of private bills reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

The SPEAKER. This is a proper parliamentary motion, the Chair thinks, and not subject to objection. It can only be opposed by a vote of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to ask whether the bill just declared by the Speaker to be passed is yet perfected until the title has been voted upon?

Mr. KEIFER. The bill was not passed; it was defeated.

The SPEAKER. It was defeated by a vote of the House on yesterday, as the gentleman will remember.

Mr. KEIFER. And it does not need a title.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry as to whether a defeated bill does need a title.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I was thinking it ought to have a title.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. MCMILLIN. I renew the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill just read until next Friday.

Mr. DUNHAM. I want to know when this bill was laid aside; I mean how many Fridays have passed since it was reported.

The SPEAKER. It was reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole House on the 18th of April.

Mr. DUNHAM. More than two months have passed since it was reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on postponing the consideration of the bill till next Friday.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 68.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] to commit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 74.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to commit was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that we should have the previous question on the bill.

Mr. MOULTON. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered—only 19 members voting therefor.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 89, noes 38.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN P. GREGSON.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 257) for the relief of John P. Gregson. The bill was reported with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read, "A bill for the relief of John P. Gregson and Francis H. Ellison."

MYRA CLARK GAINES.

The next bill reported by the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines.

The bill was reported with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the substitute be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears that Myra Clark Gaines, as the legal representative of Daniel Clark, deceased, of Louisiana, is entitled to 39,737 arpents of land, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to Thomas Urquhart, and 5,470 arpents, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to John Lynd, amounting altogether to 45,207 arpents, equal to 38,457 acres of land: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That patents shall issue in the usual manner to Myra Clark Gaines, her heirs and assigns, for all of the aforesaid lands which the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall find to be vacant, unappropriated, and undisposed of by the United States, which patent shall operate only as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not in any wise impair or preclude any adverse claimant or claimants from the right to assert the validity of their claim or claims in a court or courts of justice: Provided, That no mineral lands shall be granted by this act or located by the scrip to be issued pursuant to this act.

SEC. 2. That for all of said lands which have been disposed of by the United States, or otherwise lawfully appropriated, the number of acres so disposed of to be ascertained by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by him certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and required to pay to said Myra Clark Gaines a sum of money equivalent to $1.25 an acre for said lands so disposed of and so ascertained; and there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated a sum sufficient to pay the same.

Mr. COSGROVE. I move the previous question on the bill and substitute.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there not an amendment to the substitute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX, of New York). The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, has just been adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was there not an amendment to the substitute in regard to the payment of money? As I understand, the substitute was only for a part of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk read the amendment as a whole, as a substitute for the whole bill. It includes the money payment. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] was read as part of the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. How about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]?

Mr. COSGROVE. I think I can explain it to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Indiana. My colleague [Mr. BLAND] offered a substitute to the effect that Myra Clarke Gaines be paid money at the rate of $1.25 per acre for all land disposed of by the Government. For all undisposed of she was to have patents.

Mr. MCADOO. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] permit me one question?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCADOO. Does any land at all pass under this bill.

Mr. COSGROVE. No lands pass under this bill. But wherever the Government has disposed of lands belonging to this lady, the bill provides she shall be paid at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

Mr. HOLMAN. But if the lands are not disposed of she shall have the lands?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a land grant, so to speak.

Mr. COSGROVE. Not at all. This woman is getting only what belongs to her—what she has hitherto been robbed of. There is no land grant about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 7.

So (further count not being called for) the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COSGROVE. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were ayes—ayes 62, noes 6.

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. COSGROVE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARGARET CASSIDY.

The next bill reported by the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 3950) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy. The bill was reported without amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIS N. ARNOLD.

The next bill reported by the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 3937) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold.

The bill was reported with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROWELL. I ask to have the amendment read.

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the respective sums of money as hereinafter provided to the respective persons named herein, or to their heirs or legal representatives, to wit:

To Stephen Messengill, $137.16.
To William Swink, $502.92.
To Kenton M. Jones, $411.48. In all, $25,445.36.

Mr. ROWELL. It strikes me before the previous question is called the House ought to know what it is voting on. This substitute is a bill reported——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have demanded the previous question. I repeat, we have here a number of bills reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar that have not been acted upon by the House. They have stood here for several weeks without action; and I think it is but right there should be some disposition made of them to-day. And I will state in response to my friend from Illinois that this bill was discussed in the Committee of the Whole for half a day, and after full discussion was recommended to the House.

Mr. ROWELL. I only want five minutes to call the attention of the House to what the bill is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order pending the demand for the previous question. The gentleman from Tennessee, who is in charge of the bill has called the previous question.

The House divided upon ordering the previous question; and there were—ayes 61, noes 58.

Mr. ROWELL. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. MCMILLIN and Mr. ROWELL were appointed.

While the tellers were counting,

Mr. SPRINGER said: I ask unanimous consent that further count upon ordering the previous question be dispensed with, and that five minutes on each side be allowed for debate, and that then the previous question be ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] as a parliamentarian knows that that can not be done.

Mr. SPRINGER. It can be done by unanimous consent, and that is what I ask.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain any proposition while the House is dividing.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 96, noes 68.

So the previous question was ordered.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GEDDES. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 41 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WELLER. I ask that the substitute be now read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute has just been read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 81, nays 120, not voting 123; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced for this day:

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. CLAY with Mr. JEFFORDS.

Mr. TULLY with Mr. GEORGE.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York, with Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. HAMMOND with Mr. REED.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. BOUTELLE.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. MURPHY.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

The question was taken upon the motion to recommit; and upon a division there were—ayes 87, noes 59.

So (no further count being called for) the bill was recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

ALONZO GESNER.

The next private bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1299) for the relief of Alonzo Gesner.

The question was upon the adoption of the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole to add to the bill the following: "Which said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for said purpose."

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the bill with the amendment.

The bill as proposed to be amended was read.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. T. PICKETT.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3181) for the relief of J. T. Pickett.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 534, which is similar in terms to this House bill, be taken from the Speaker's table and passed in lieu of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the House bill reported from the Committee of the Whole will be laid on the table and the House will proceed to the consideration of the corresponding Senate bill now on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection.

The bill (S. 534) for the relief of J. T. Pickett was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. T. Pickett, formerly consul at Vera Cruz, Mexico, out of any unappropriated money in the United States Treasury, the sum of $1,375, being the amount advanced and disbursed by him, while acting as such consul, for the relief of destitute American citizens not seamen.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TILLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COL. HENRY J. HUNT.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 78) to provide for the retirement of Col. Henry J. Hunt as a major-general of the United States Army.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

Mr. LYMAN. I move the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry J. Hunt was, on the 14th day of September, 1883, retired from active service as colonel of the Fifth Regiment of Artillery, by due operation of law, after more than forty-four years of continuous active, honorable, and distinguished service in the Army of the United States; and

Whereas the said Henry J. Hunt exercised the appropriate command of a major-general in the field during the greater portion of the late war, and at the date of his retirement he was in command of a geographical military department, held the command of a major-general of the United States Army by brevet, dating from March 13, 1865, conferred upon him for "gallant and meritorious services in the field during the rebellion:" Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to place Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry J. Hunt on the retired-list of major-generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major-general of the United States Army on the retired-list, to date from September 14, 1883.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was to insert after the word "authorized," in line 3, the words "to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint and," and to strike out after the words "retired-list," in line 5, the words "of major-generals," and insert "as a major-general."

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not be in order to move to amend this bill so as to allow this officer to be retired on the rank that he held in the Army?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been called.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that it would remove an objection to this bill if it were amended so as to retire this officer on the rank which he held in the Army—the rank of colonel, I believe.

Mr. LYMAN. That would not give him the pay to which he is justly entitled. He is already retired as a colonel.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think that some further explanation of this bill should be given. It has not been customary to pass bills of this kind; and whenever we have sent to the Senate a bill retiring an officer upon rank higher than he actually held the Senate has always amended the bill so as to retire him upon his actual rank.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the previous question.

Mr. MILLS. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw the call for the previous question, and give the House an explanation of the bill.

Mr. LYMAN. I have no desire to cut off debate or explanation of the bill. I therefore withdraw the call for the previous question and will explain, as I thought I explained fully the other day, that this officer rendered eminent service during the war in the artillery corps and only failed to be promoted to the rank of major-general because in the artillery branch of the service there were no promotions to that rank. Of the one hundred and fifty-six commissions issued to major-generals of the United States Army during the war not one was issued to any artillery officer. General Hunt was the first artillery officer in the service, and by remaining in the artillery corps waived his right to promotion.

Mr. McMILLIN. This is a bill for the retirement of an officer with a rank which he never actually held. If we pass this bill it will be, I believe, the first instance of the kind.

Mr. LYMAN. This officer was promoted to be a full brigadier-general of the volunteer service and breveted a major-general. But he was never assigned to duty upon that rank. By remaining in the artillery corps he was denied the promotion which he ought to have had. He held a position equal in responsibility to that of a corps commander, but received only the pay of a colonel. His expenses were great. He was obliged to pay out about $2,000 a year during that war. He actually expended the whole of his own slender fortune and that of his wife to support the dignity of his rank. He served with distinction throughout the war in many bloody battles and expended from his own means $8,000.

Mr. KING. I believe this officer was chief of artillery in the Army of the Potomac.

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. A very worthy officer, I understand.

Mr. LYMAN. He held the very highest rank attainable in his branch of the service.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated the effect of this bill so far as concerns the rank of this officer. I hope he will also state what will be its effect in increasing the pay of this officer upon the retired-list.

Mr. LYMAN. This will raise his pay about $1,500 or $2,000 a year. I can give the exact figures if required.

Mr. McMILLIN. What does he now get?

Mr. LYMAN. Three thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars.

Mr. McMILLIN. The proposition is to raise it to about $5,000, where services are nothing.

Mr. LYMAN. What?

Mr. McMILLIN. Where no services have been rendered?

Mr. LYMAN. He has rendered services; he has expended his own private fortune for the benefit of his country. If no one asks for further explanation I will renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was agreed to, and as amended the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LYMAN demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. PRICE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 127, nays 58, not voting 139; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following additional pairs were announced:

On all political questions for this day:

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, with Mr. PUSEY.

Mr. STRUBLE with Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky.

Mr. DIBRELL with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Mr. VAN EATON with Mr. STRAIT.

Mr. VANCE with Mr. HITT.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. BRUMM, on all political questions until Monday next.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I learn that Mr. STRUBLE, with whom I am paired, would vote "no;" and as we are both on the same side, I have voted in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. LYMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY A. LEE.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 807) for the relief of Mary A. Lee; which was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH F. WILSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 275) for the relief of Joseph F. Wilson.

Mr. HALSELL. I move by unanimous consent Senate bill 42 be taken up and passed instead of the House bill.

There was no objection, and the House bill was laid on the table.

A bill (S. 42) for the relief of Joseph F. Wilson was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act for the relief of Joseph F. Wilson.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to issue to Joseph F. Wilson, of Peoria, Ill., or his legal representatives or assigns, a number of warrants equal to eighty acres, in tracts not less than the subdivisions provided for in the United States land laws, to be located by the said Wilson, or his legal representatives or assigns, on any of the unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States subject to pre-emption or homestead settlement, in lieu of the west half of the northeast quarter of section 19, in township 35 north, of range 5 west, situate in Porter County, Indiana, which said tract of land was entered by and patented to Josiah Smith, of Macon County, Missouri, under and by virtue of the provisions of the acts of Congress approved June 8, 1872, and March 3, 1873, relating to additional homesteads, and by the said Josiah Smith, after his said entry, sold and conveyed to the said Wilson, and of the title to and possession of which the said Wilson was divested and dispossessed by the judgment and decree of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Indiana at the November term, A. D., 1880, thereof, by reason of a prior disposal of or a prior equitable title in and to said tract of land, as the said court held and decided, to or in persons other than the said Josiah Smith; and the said Wilson, or his legal representatives or assigns, after the location of the said warrants on such lands as he or they may select, shall be allowed patents for the lands so located. And the lands taken, selected, and located as authorized and provided for by this act shall be in full satisfaction of any claim, right, or benefit which the said Josiah Smith or any one claiming under him may have, or may have had, under and by virtue of the provisions of the said acts of Congress, as well as in full satisfaction of any claim which the said Wilson, as assignee or grantee of the said Josiah Smith, may have, or may have had, against the United States touching said described tract of land.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be informed as to how many acres are involved in this question?

Mr. PARKER. Eighty acres. It is a small tract.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and, being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 394) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Jones;

A bill (H. R. 432) to increase the pension of Joseph B. Sellers;

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

WILLIAM J. LEE.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 1073) granting a pension to William J. Lee.

Mr. BAGLEY. When this bill was considered in committee on the 24th of May the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] made the point of no quorum, and an agreement was then entered into that it should be favorably reported and a yea-and-nay vote taken in the House. I wish to say this is a bill placing upon the pension-roll William J. Lee, a scout of the Army of the Potomac. It comes recommended by that committee, and letters were read in support of it from General Grant, General Sharpe, and other prominent men, all of them to the effect that it was a most meritorious case.

To comply with the agreement I would ask for the yeas and nays on this bill. I presume the gentleman from Georgia insists upon that, although I will be glad to have him withdraw the demand.

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a question for the House to determine whether it will order the yeas and nays or not.

Mr. CRISP. That was not the understanding. They were considered as ordered when consent was given to allow the bill to be reported. There was no objection made to that understanding in the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee of the Whole, however, can not order the yeas and nays so as to control the House.

Mr. CRISP. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in the Committee of the Whole those at least that were present agreed to it; and certainly now they can not decline to sustain the call when it was unanimously agreed to at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No agreement on the part of the committee has any binding force in that respect upon the action of the House.

Mr. CRISP. But it has upon the conscience of gentlemen who were present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has nothing to do with the conscience of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. I do not know whether the Chair has anything to do with it or not, but as a member of the House I have the right to appeal to the conscience of the House to sustain an agreement of that character, and I take it that there is something there that will respond to the demand with honor.

Mr. PARKER. I ask of the House to be permitted to say a few words upon this bill, as I believe it was laid over at my suggestion and upon an agreement on the part of the committee that there should be a yea-and-nay vote in the House. While I am strongly in favor of this bill, to which I believe there is no objection, and while I am aware that it once passed the House at the last session of Congress and has the indorsement of General Grant and other distinguished officers, I think the vote by yeas and nays should be taken upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that debate is hardly in order.

Mr. PARKER. Then I will not detain the House any longer.

Mr. BAGLEY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAGLEY. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BAGLEY. I would like to have made a little explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the present question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill. Does the gentleman from New York desire the yeas and nays to be taken on that question or on the passage of the bill?

Mr. BAGLEY. On the passage of the bill. I presume the gentleman from Georgia meant——

Mr. CRISP. The only purpose I have in view is to obtain a vote upon this bill by a quorum of the House. I am perfectly willing to obtain that in any way, either by tellers or by a division, simply to obtain the sense of the House, as I regard this as a departure from the policy heretofore pursued in these cases. I have no disposition to procrastinate, but simply to have a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question will first be taken upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill, upon which, as the Chair now understands, the gentleman does not desire the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRISP. No, sir.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, I propose, in order to save time, if it meets his views, that we might take a vote on this by tellers.

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order, if there be no objection, will be vacated.

There was no objection, so the order of the House for the yeas and nays was vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will now appoint tellers to take the vote upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAGLEY and Mr. CRISP were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 27.

Mr. CRISP. In view of the fact that the affirmative is a good deal more than half of a quorum, and that nearly a quorum has voted, I do not want to obstruct the public business, and withdraw the call for further count.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was passed.

A. H. HERR.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 4380) for the relief of A. H. Herr.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to A. H. Herr, of the District of Columbia, the sum of $15,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the use and occupation of the island of Virginius, known as Herr's Island, during the late war by the Army of the United States.

Mr. ROWELL. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ROWELL. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 51.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. POST, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. ROWELL.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 46.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on the point as to a quorum. This belongs to a class of cases that should not pass without a quorum. I ask for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 12; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Count the other side.

The negative vote was counted; and there were noes 68.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, not to lose its place on the orders of the House.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I object, and move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 38, noes 98.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN] withdraws his objection to the bill being laid aside, not to lose its place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside, not to lose its place.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the House take a recess till 8 o'clock this evening.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 62.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement. There are only two or three bills reported by the Committee of the Whole remaining to be disposed of. They were reported some six weeks ago. I ask the House to let them be acted upon. They have stood aside every Friday. They passed the Committee of the Whole without objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are nine bills reported by the Committee of the Whole House still undisposed of.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. VALENTINE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VALENTINE. At the evening session of the House on the 24th instant, when the House had under consideration the bill for the protection of the soldiers' homes in one of the Western States, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] asked consent to offer an amendment to that bill, which I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska stated, as the Chair understood him, that he rose to a question of privilege. It has not yet been stated so as to enable the Chair to decide. The Clerk will read what the gentleman sends to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That wherever a soldier has been an inmate of any one of the national soldiers' homes for a period of not less than twelve months, and shall have during that time a record of good behavior, it shall be optional with him to retire from said home and receive from the funds appropriated for the maintenance of the home of which he was a member $10 for every month he shall remain away from said home.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] asked and obtained leave, though it does not appear of record but I state it as a matter of fact because I was present and heard it, that he might be permitted to print some remarks upon that amendment. I with others present assented to the request of the gentleman. I find in the RECORD to-day a speech said to have been delivered by him on that amendment. I find in that speech he has left the subject upon which he has asked the privilege to print and has used language therein which I think is an abuse of the privilege granted at that time. After referring to the soldiers' homes he passes to the subject of land-grabbers or what is known as the land monoplists of this country, and has taken occasion to print as a part of his remarks on this amendment a very long dispatch sent from this city to the New York Star of the 6th of January last. The article, after many other things, says:

The names, &c., of our native land monopolists would fill every page of this issue of the Star. I select only a few from the several States and Territories, as follows:

Then appears a long list of persons who are said to own in the aggregate something over 7,000,000 acres of land. In the list as printed in the RECORD of to-day I find the name of—

Senator JOHN A. LOGAN, 80,000 acres.

Now, Senator LOGAN called my attention to this matter a short time ago to-day and desired me to say to this House that so far as it related to him it was absolutely false; that the only land that he owned in the world was a little homestead in the State of Illinois upon which he was born.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire of the Chair how this is a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] will state what the question of privilege is.

Mr. VALENTINE. It is this: I with other members of this House relying in good faith upon the belief that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] would print only such matter as was right upon the subject in regard to which he asked leave to print gave consent to it. The point I make is that the gentleman has gone outside of and has left that subject, and taken occasion, while he was lauding the soldiers of this land, to stab one of the brightest and most gallant soldiers that ever defended his country. [Applause and cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the matter of privilege which he desires to present to this House.

Mr. VALENTINE. I am trying to state it. I say that to my mind the action of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] in this regard is an abuse of the privilege granted him by this House.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. My point of order is that there is no resolution or proposition pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it a matter of privilege merely to correct an erroneous statement contained in the RECORD. If the gentleman has any resolution or proposition to submit to the House he can do so, and then the Chair will decide whether it is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. VALENTINE. A resolution will be offered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Leave to print.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman from Illinois says "leave to print." That is the trouble now; we granted one gentleman leave to print and he abused that leave.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that when a member is granted leave to print he may print anything which he might have said in order on the floor of the House. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] so far has not disclosed anything which would have been out of order if spoken by a member on the floor.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think if that language had been spoken in debate on the floor, referring to a Senator of the United States, it would have been out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the language to refer to the gentleman in his Senatorial capacity, but the name is simply mentioned with others in the discussion of a general subject.

Mr. VALENTINE. It says "Senator JOHN A. LOGAN."

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. So far as my friend from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] has proceeded he has disclosed nothing in the shape of a question of privilege. So far as printing in the RECORD is concerned, the gentleman has introduced no resolution to correct the RECORD. We know very well, and I pledge myself here now on behalf of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], that if he finds out that he has committed an error in copying from the New York Star any statement derogatory to General LOGAN he will correct it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope so.

Mr. COX, of New York. And that is more than you will do.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to go on, for I understand the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] is ready to meet him.

Mr. VALENTINE. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I think, Mr. Speaker, that a question of privilege is involved here.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask for what purpose the gentleman from Illinois rises?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the purpose of the gentleman is to show that a question of privilege is involved.

Mr. CANNON. I will try to bring myself within the rules if I can have the attention of the House

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. In the RECORD of to-day I find the following:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 24, 1884.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. 1404) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, or Nebraska, and for other purposes—

Mr. MCADOO said:

Mr. SPEAKER:

And then is printed what purports to be the speech of the gentleman. Further on in the speech I find this:

In this connection I want to put before the House and the country the following statement from the New York Star of January 6 last past.

The gentleman makes the statement a part of his own remarks. Along in that statement I find the following:

The names, &c., of our native land monopolists would fill every page of this issue of the Star. I select only a few from the several States and Territories, as follows.

In the list of names I find the following:

Senator JOHN A. LOGAN, 80,000 acres.

Now, I turn to the RECORD of the proceedings of the 24th of this month and I find it perfectly silent touching any leave given to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] to print remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MCADOO. Allow me a question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MCADOO. Has not the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE], who was present that evening, admitted that I had leave from the House to print?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has so stated. So that now, taking the RECORD of the 24th and that of the 27th (to-day), the RECORD upon its face misleads the House apparently and the country. In other words, for anything that appears upon the face of this RECORD the gentleman from New Jersey did make this speech, and his fellow-members sat about him and let it pass unchallenged; whereas in truth and in fact the speech never was made.

Now, I claim it is my right that this RECORD should show the gentleman did not stand in his place and make this newspaper article his own, calling the attention of the House and the country to that matter, but rather, under a lax practice which prevails in this House, and I believe ought not to prevail, abused the privileges of this House, and put that into his address which never was spoken and which in my opinion he ought not to have put there. And I think that, according to the common understanding of the different members of this House, he violated at least the rules of propriety and fair dealing when he placed it there. If he had said it in my hearing I should have controverted it at the time, because, as has been well stated here, the gentleman referred to owns no land except a small quantity in Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, where is the question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois stated that he thought he could show that this did involve a question of privilege.

Mr. COX, of New York. Has he shown it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to say that the gentleman from New Jersey did not in fact have leave to print a speech.

Mr. CANNON. I am coming to my question of privilege in a moment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, before the gentleman proceeds, in order that the gentleman may confine himself to the point, that the Chair itself has no more power over the RECORD than any other member of the House. If a resolution were offered to expunge certain matter from the RECORD, then the House of course could act upon that; but the Chair can not decide whether any particular matter should or should not be in the RECORD.

Mr. FOLLETT. The statement has been made by the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from New Jersey made no remarks on the 24th. The proceedings of the 24th are published in the RECORD of the 25th; and on page 6234 I read this:

[Mr. MCADOO addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter.]

[Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I did state that the RECORD of the proceedings of the 24th did not show that consent was given; and what I now desire under the resolution which I shall offer in a moment is to so amend this RECORD that it shall show this speech was printed and not delivered; so that when the gentleman goes to the country he shall go upon the facts just as they are, and can not claim that he made unchallenged the remark "before the House and before the country."

Mr. COX, of New York. I rose to a point of order some time ago; and I desire to renew with some urgency the point I made. If the gentleman from Illinois is so anxious to preserve the purity of the RECORD why did not he or the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] make some motion of this kind when on the 7th day of June, 1884, there appeared in the RECORD, under the head of "The Tariff," a speech entitled "Speech of Hon. J. HART BREWER, of New Jersey, in the House of Representatives, Tuesday, May 6, 1884, on the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes?" I will read only a short paragraph from that speech. The rest of it is too obnoxious to read. Why, you undertake to strain at a gnat and you swallow a whole menagerie of camels. [Laughter.]

Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I said all that I wish to say on the tariff in my speech in the Forty-seventh Congress——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. What is the title of that speech? Is it "Twenty Years in the Government Service, and Tattooed at last?"

Mr. COX, of New York. I did hope and trust that this Congress would adjourn without our having this partisan Presidential discussion. Our side of the House has not brought forward Mr. Blaine or Mr. LOGAN.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But your side of the House has brought forward——

Mr. COX, of New York. I say our side of the House has acted so as to have the encomiums——

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You are trying to defend a slander.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am not trying to defend anything. I said that if there was an error my friend from New Jersey would correct it.

Mr. CANNON. I do not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield further.

Mr. COX, of New York. What I wish to say is——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor and declines to yield further.

Mr. COX, of New York. I made the point of order. He ought not to be on the floor at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already decided that so far nothing of a privileged character has appeared in the statement made. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] sends up a resolution, which will be read, after which the Chair will decide whether it presents a question of privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the RECORD of June 25, 1884, be so amended that it may show that the speech purporting to have been delivered by Mr. MCADOO, of New Jersey, in which reference is made to Senator JOHN A. LOGAN and others, was not actually delivered in the House, but was "printed" in the RECORD of the 27th of June instant.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to amend.

Mr. CANNON. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is this a question of privilege?

Mr. RANDALL. It must go on, as it has been now begun.

The SPEAKER. The House has the right to correct the RECORD in any manner it pleases. The Chair will therefore entertain the resolution and allow the gentleman to be heard on it. The gentleman from Illinois is on the floor.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the House owes it to itself to adopt this resolution. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] a moment ago rose in his place, as he is in the habit of doing when he or his friends are in a close place, and attempted to turn this matter into ridicule. I had no object when I asked the gentleman from Nebraska to yield to me except to see that the privileges of this House were maintained. It is not a political question. I do not speak of it or refer to it from that standpoint. It is a question whether or not the records of this House, of its debates and proceedings, shall be the records and debates of the House in fact, or whether they shall be only the records of essays of those gentlemen who shall deem it proper to insert them there on any subject being considered by the House, and so have them become the mere receptacle of political malice and individual malignity on the part of such members as may not have the courage to stand up squarely on this floor and openly make such assaults.

It is admitted, as I understand, and I am informed by the Official Reporter such is the fact, this speech, purporting to be a speech which had been delivered, misleads the House and misleads the country; that it professes to exist as an actual verbal utterance on the floor of this House, when in fact and in truth it was never delivered on the floor of this House.

As to the taste of inserting this speech under those circumstances, and in it indorsing a newspaper article, or a dispatch which was sent on the 5th day of last January, giving it currency and approval, is perhaps a question for the gentleman from New Jersey himself to determine. As to that I am willing the country and his associates on both sides of this House shall judge. But, sir, the question as to the truth, if you choose the decency, of the records of this House of Representatives is a subject we are all deeply interested in, and from that standpoint I ask for the adoption of the pending resolution.

I will now yield back the floor to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE].

Mr. BLACKBURN. Are you going to have all the debate over there?

Mr. VALENTINE. I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois and he has only returned it back to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois and it comes out of the time of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. VALENTINE. Now, Mr. Speaker, my statement was not that the allegation that any Senator or Member of this House was the possessor of a large quantity of land in the United States should be considered as very derogatory to him, but when it is taken in connection, as it must be when you examine the RECORD, with the language used by the gentleman from New Jersey, you will find, I think, its insertion here under the circumstances was an abuse which should be promptly corrected. After talking about the building of this additional soldiers' home he patriotically refers to the soldiers themselves, and then uses language as follows:

Sir, the honest, patriotic, and intelligent soldiers of this land, whose valor preserved the Union, will no longer permit themselves to be shields for such rascality or the ready recipients of such unwholesome flattery. The time is rapidly approaching when in the interest alike of the soldier and the entire people the land and the pension laws must cease to be patchworks of inconsistency and injustice.

Then follows the dispatch to which I have alluded; and in this connection I claim it was unjust, that it was taking advantage of the House, taking undue advantage of me and every member who was present on that occasion and yielded assent to the printing of his remarks which he requested on the amendment he had offered.

If you examine the RECORD of the 25th, referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT], and nowhere, after the gentleman offered his amendment, will you find any statement that he addressed the House, but inserted several pages in advance is the statement that he did so.

I know personally that he had that permission to print some remarks upon this question in the RECORD, but I claim that it was exercised in violation of the rules, and that the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois ought therefore to prevail.

Mr. Speaker, I have no desire, I will say to my friend from New York [Mr. COX], at this time or at any other time to precipitate anything upon this House in the nature of a political debate. I have not done so, nor has this side of the House. That was precipitated upon us in the dark by a gentleman upon that side of the House. He did not make the speech upon this floor, but he took occasion, after we had given him a right to print under his request, to go outside of that right and open up the political question, if you please, by attacking the nominee of this side of the House for Vice-President of this country.

I have been reading, sir, the debate in this House which occurred on February 22, 1870, upon a question similar to this, where I find my friend from New York also took part, and I believe that he to-day will stand with me and other members on this floor in saying that the right to print under the circumstances in which it is granted by the House is so often abused by members of this and other Houses that it should not prevail, and it is time for the House to insist that when this courtesy is extended to a member it must not be abused, but that he should strictly adhere in his language to the facts of the case, and insert nothing except what is absolutely true and decorous to those who have granted him the right.

I now reserve the remainder of my time, as I presume the gentleman from New Jersey desires to be heard.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaher, if there is to be any comparison between my personal honor and my actions toward the members of this House and that of the gentleman from Illinois, I am very willing to leave the decision to the members of this House themselves and to the country. Let them judge between us. I want to make a very clear, simple, and brief statement about the publication of this speech to which the gentleman excepts.

On the evening of the 24th of this month, while I was in my place here to do my duty as a member of this body, there was before us for consideration a bill in relation to the construction of an additional home for disabled volunteer soldiers. During the course of the consideration of the bill I desired to offer an amendment which I regarded as important. It was a radical amendment to the bill and which I had intended to discuss before the House, but under the rules and under the circumstances then prevailing I was unable to get the floor for that purpose; consequently I was not permitted to present my reasons for offering it or to present the arguments which I thought would have weight with the House to induce its adoption. I accordingly asked leave simply to print my remarks in connection with the amendment in the RECORD. That permission was unanimously accorded to me. With that power from the House I wrote and sent to the Official Reporter of this House the speech which has been published in the RECORD and as to which comment has been made.

I want now, sir, simply to say this: that I do not retract a solitary word of that speech. I want to say that I accept the authorship of it in its entirety. I do not consider for one moment I have violated in any degree any rule of propriety or equity, or any rule of manhood or fair dealing, as between man and man, in the publication thereof. I have simply done, sir, what has been frequently done by the members of this House. I incorporated into my speech an extract from a reputable public newspaper of this country—a thing which has been done frequently by members of the House in similar cases. I have not commented in one line, or word, or syllable of that speech upon that article which I so incorporated.

And now, sir, what is that article which has raised such a breeze upon the other side of this House? It was published when? It was published last January in one of the most reputable newspapers of the United States; published in the great metropolis of New York city. It has been copied from Maine to California, from Montreal to New Orleans, and during that whole period from January last until the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] rose in his place to-day in response, not a line of contradiction has appeared either from the supersensitive Senator himself or his friends with relation to his name in that list.

More than that. The greater part of that article has been published time and again in the speeches of gentlemen in this House. And as to its connection with this subject of pensions, I submit to every candid reader of the speech that I have connected it logically and reasonably with the remarks which preceded it. What did I say? I said that the right of the soldier to one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain was inseparably connected with the subject of pensions.

Mr. VALENTINE rose.

Mr. MCADOO. The gentleman rises. I am not sure that I used the words "one hundred and sixty acres;" but in substance I showed that the question of pensions, as it presented itself to my mind, and the subject of the public lands were inseparably connected. And in asking this House to make just and equitable pension laws I called its attention to the twin subject of the public lands, and asked that they also be preserved for the soldier and citizen alike.

The gentleman says that I have acted with discourtesy, and that I have not the courage to speak openly on the floor what I have printed. Sir, in the State from whence I come and in the district which I have the honor to represent in this House the vilest enemy that I have never yet whispered that I was lacking in courage or in manhood. I have never said behind the back of a living man that which I would not say to his face. [Applause.] I have never yet in a public career longer than falls to the lot of most men of my years sought to strike a public or a private man with an innuendo even when I could go as the prophet did of old and say to him as he said to the Israelitish king, "Thou art the man." [Applause.]

I do not wonder that the gentleman gets excited. I do not wonder at the turbulent eloquence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Why has this subject been brought before this House? Because the integrity of the RECORD has been violated or the rules connected therewith? The gentleman knows better than that. He rose not to preserve the integrity of the RECORD, not to bring the attention of the country to the violation of the rules with regard to publications therein, but simply because he found the name of JOHN A. LOGAN in the published extract among those who were charged with being large owners of land.

If the Senator from Illinois got his land honestly I have not anything to say of his private action in acquiring it; but I do deprecate the principle, as is done in the article. I deprecate and condemn the principle that allows any man, whether he be a humble citizen or a great Senator, to acquire and monopolize large tracts of public or private lands. And my animadversions, if I made any at all, if I would make any now, would not be against his ownership of 80,000 acres of land, as charged in the article, but I would as a public man and a public representative most heartily condemn the principle that allows the aggregation of land in an individual to the extent of 80,000 acres.

But, as I have said before, the Senator and his friends have remained month after month while the great public prints of this country disseminated this article by the millions of copies—have remained silent as the tomb. There has not been a whisper, not a syllable, not a note of indignation from the eloquent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. But when that Senator has been put forward as the standard-bearer—the standard-bearer of his party peculiarly in connection with the subject of soldiers and their pensions—then it is that the choler of the gentleman from Illinois mounts as it does to the foaming point. Then it is that he breaks out upon this House with affected indignation, asking that I shall be marked as having been guilty, as a member of this House, of discourtesy toward this honorable body; that I shall be marked as a violator of the rules of etiquette which ought to govern gentlemen in their action one toward another, and that I shall be condemned for having violated the integrity of the public RECORD.

I want to say, so far as the question of the RECORD is concerned, that I believe and am credibly informed that the gentleman from Illinois himself did not deliver his tariff speech in this House.

Mr. CANNON. Nor is it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MCADOO. Then I have been misinformed. But I had the impression that I saw the gentleman's speech in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MCADOO. Some friend states we were spared that infliction. But the gentleman asked for leave to print.

Mr. CANNON. I did not, and have not printed.

Mr. MCADOO. I understand the gentleman from Illinois that he denies having addressed the committee upon the subject of the tariff; that he denies having made any speech upon the subject, or that the RECORD contains any reference to him with regard to that subject.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman desire me to state the exact fact about that?

Mr. MCADOO. Oh, no. I want an answer to the question—did you address the committee with reference to the tariff?

Mr. COX, of New York. And if not, why not?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can pursue his own course, and I will pursue mine.

Mr. MCADOO. I find in the RECORD of April 23, page 3531, the following:

[Mr. CANNON addressed the committee. His remarks will appear hereafter.]

[Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman having said he did not address the committee, I ask him does the RECORD lie? When the gentleman says he made no remarks, then I ask him, does the RECORD lie again? When it says his remarks will appear hereafter, I ask him, are you going to print hereafter? The gentleman remains silent.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer in my own time.

Mr. MCADOO. The gentleman remains silent because the facts are against him. I will give the gentleman time to answer now. I will give the gentleman two minutes of my time to answer me.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer in my own time when the gentleman is through. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MCADOO. Then the gentleman is afraid, while I am on the floor, to answer me to my face and say whether the RECORD contains a lie or not when it says that the gentleman addressed the committee on the subject of the tariff.

Now, if I had acted as the gentleman did, if I had acted as some gentlemen have done, then instead of doing such a fair thing as merely printing this article, giving the newspaper and the date, I would have done as I have known men to do here. I might have got up on this floor on the evening in question, and after obtaining the privilege of this House I might have made a statement to this effect. I might have said to the deluded soldiers of this land, "What do you think of a great Senator who, in his greed to absorb the territory which belongs to the actual settler in a land that was made for independent freeholders and small farmers—what do you think of a man who poses as a statesman and a patriot, as the friend par excellence of the soldier, and who, under the cover of his son-in-law, went to New Mexico and tried to pre-empt the most valuable land lying along her streams, and was only estopped by the public officer finding out that it belonged to another class which he professes the utmost friendship for, and who from his manner and appearance rumor says has their blood in his veins, tried to steal from his own kith and kin hundreds of thousands of acres of land [great laughter and applause on the Democratic side], taking his lands from the unfortunate savage who was unable to protect himself until an honest Secretary of the Interior went there with the surveyor and took back the land for the Zunis?" [Renewed laughter and applause.]

I thank Heaven that my natural sensibilities and association with a party that has not in it on this floor any one man mean enough to do a thing like that prevents me from hurling such an innuendo against any man. [Cries of "Oh!" Oh!" from the Republican side.] It might come with good grace from gentlemen who, no matter how noble their attributes may be, no matter how keen their natural sensibilities may be from long association with such men, have had their moral sensibilities dulled and blunted until they can not discern between right and wrong with that sharp discrimination which belongs to men of honor, men of rectitude, and men of integrity. [Applause.]

I leave this subject to the House. I am sneaking behind no newspaper. I thank my friend from New York [Mr. COX] who spoke truly of me when he said that if it was proved here or elsewhere that I had done injustice to the humblest man I would in a moment manfully and promptly apologize. God knows I would not wrong a living man, whether he be high or low. My friend from New York was right in that.

I have simply put in that speech without comment, without approval, without a word one way or the other, an article taken from the public records which have been spread before the people throughout this land, put it where they might deal with it again. Let the gentleman deal with it. My record speaks for itself.

I now yield two minutes to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS], and will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think our friends on the other side had better remove the beam from their own eyes before they try to extract the motes from the eyes of others. I move as an amendment to the resolution which has been offered that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CANNON. I will hear the amendment read for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. CANNON. Yes; for debate. I think I have charge of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has charge of the resolution, of course, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois to make any motion he desires in regard to it.

Mr. CANNON. I am willing the amendment shall be read for information.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the RECORD of June 21, 1884, be so amended as to show that the speech purported to have been delivered by Mr. CUTCHEON, of Michigan, was not actually delivered in the House, but was printed in the RECORD of June 21, 1884.

Mr. HOPKINS. On Thursday last the House had before it for consideration the bill to prohibit the importation of laborers under contract. It was a non-partisan bill, and its friends were seeking to have it passed as a just measure without exciting any political feeling. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] asked leave to print some remarks on that bill. I find in the speech which was printed that the gentleman has made an assault on the Democratic party and an unfair and unjust assault on the author of that bill. I think, therefore, it is time that gentlemen on the other side should know that this practice is abused, if abused it is, by some of their own friends. And I desire to say now that I propose to answer that speech in to-morrow's RECORD.

Mr. MCADOO. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY].

Mr. HENLEY. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Official Reporter of Debates be instructed to furnish for publication in the RECORD the remarks of Mr. CUTCHEON, of Michigan, reflecting on General Ulysses S. Grant, made on the Fitz-John Porter bill and suppressed from the RECORD.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HENLEY. Inasmuch as this seems to be an era of amendment and correction, I have, as a delicate concession to the sense of rectitude of our friends on the other side, offered this amendment for the purpose of amending and correcting the RECORD, which, as the House may be advised, has hitherto been somewhat distorted and marred by the withholding on the part of the gentleman from Michigan of a singularly scurrilous and vindictive attack upon the name of General Grant in the course of a debate on this floor on the Fitz-John Porter bill.

My object simply is to incorporate in the RECORD (if the RECORD must speak what has been uttered on this floor and nothing else and nothing more) the observations submitted by the gentleman from Michigan upon the case to which I have referred, but which he, for some unheard-of and hitherto-unexplained reason, withheld from the world. I do this in the interest of honesty, in the interest of fair play, and more particularly in the interest of our friends up there in the reporters' gallery, who have expressed to me their mortification and embarrassment over this particular matter. It arose, Mr. Speaker, in this way: When they heard the speech of the gentleman from Michigan they transmitted all over this land upon the wings of electricity the assault that he had made on General Grant. Lo! the next morning, upon the appearance of the RECORD, it turned out that they had lied or somebody had. [Laughter.] Therefore, since our friends on the other side are disposed to repent, since they are disposed to see that the RECORD shall speak the truth and the truth only, let us have this put in the RECORD by all means.

Gentlemen, I expect your commendation and applause for what I must (although it may sound egotistical) characterize as this upright, courageous, and honest movement on my part to make things right. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MCADOO. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for five minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to read all this that I hold in my hand. I simply ask to have the following added as an amendment to what has been proposed by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS]——

Mr. CANNON. The amendment I suppose is read as part of the gentleman's remarks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that these amendments are being read for information. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further resolved, That so much of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 7, 1884, as contains the supposed speech of Hon. J. HART BREWER, be, and the same be hereby, ordered to be stricken out.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House takes a recess till 8 o'clock this evening. [Great laughter.]

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. resumed its session, and was called to order by Mr. BAGLEY, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Clerk read the following:

Hon. J. H. BAGLEY, jr., will preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

JUNE 27, 1884.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the House meets to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the consideration of business under the special order of the House just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering pension bills on the Private Calendar.

FRANCES E. HENDRICKS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2059) to increase the pension of Frances E. Hendricks, reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. MORRILL.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to rerate the pension of Frances E. Hendricks, widow of John A. Hendricks, late colonel of the Twenty-second Indiana Volunteers, killed in the battle of Pea Ridge, at the sum of $50 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the following amendments:

In line 4, strike out the word "rerate" and insert the word "increase;" in line 7, strike out the word "at" and insert in lieu thereof the word "to."

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that Frances E. Hendricks is the widow of Col. John A. Hendricks, who fell mortally wounded while leading his regiment at the battle of Pea Ridge. She is now receiving $30 per month and asks that it be increased to $50. The committee feel the full force of all the arguments urged in favor of the claimant, but we can not overlook the fact that there are a large number of widows in our land whose cases are similar to this one, and a careful investigation of this case fails to disclose any special reasons why an exception should be made in favor of this claimant. The committee can not forget that thousands of private soldiers, as loyal and brave as ever shouldered a musket, fell on the battlefield, leaving widows and helpless children to mourn their loss, and yet these widows receive the pitiful sum of $8 per month. While the sympathies of the committee are with the claimant, and they realize fully that no money consideration can compensate her for her great loss, yet they feel that legislation in this direction should be general and not special, and therefore ask that this bill lie on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over for this evening, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid on the table?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to hear a statement of the facts of this case, as I was not here the other night when it was discussed.

Mr. MORRILL. The case is a very simple one. Colonel Hendricks fell leading his regiment at the battle of Pea Ridge. His wife is now receiving the regular pension of a colonel's widow, $30 per month. The bill was introduced to increase that pension to $50 per month. The Committee on Invalid Pensions directed an adverse report to be made, for the reason that there is no instance where the widow of a colonel or of any officer of lower rank than colonel has received $50 a month. The case was called up at the last meeting on last Friday evening, when the question of a quorum was raised, and it was passed over.

Mr. RANDALL. It was not passed over.

Mr. MORRILL. If any colonel's widow's pension is to be raised this is a meritorious case, for the man was killed with his regiment. He was taken off the battlefield dead.

Mr. MATSON. My colleague on the committee is, I think, inaccurate in two respects: First, my recollection is, without having referred to the records, that Colonel Hendricks was lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-second Indiana, and that Jeff. Davis was colonel of the regiment at the time of the battle of Pea Ridge.

He is inaccurate on the other side. There are one or two precedents for granting pensions to widows' officers below those of colonel, increasing their pensions to $50 a month. They have been pressed on the Committee on Invalid Pensions during this Congress in behalf of a number of others, bills which are now pending, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions thought the line ought to be drawn where it is. They have been willing to give the widows of general officers $50 a month. They were not willing to go beyond that and give widows of any below that. If Colonel Hendricks's widow is to receive $50 a month because he was killed on the field of battle, there is no reason why the widow of every single soldier who was killed on the field of battle should not receive $50 a month also.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No special reason why this should be made an exception.

Mr. MATSON. None, except he was killed at the head of his regiment. It was argued the other night, Mr. Chairman, that the widows of officers who were with their regiments, who were perhaps conspicuous for gallantry, ought to be pensioned at a higher rate than the widows of private soldiers. I do not subscribe to that doctrine. I think, in the first place, particularly in the case of volunteer officers where there is no lifetime service, where they entered the war for a given period, or for a period coexistent with the war itself, afterward to return to their homes as citizens and stand on a perfect equality, the widow of one man who was a volunteer should not receive more than another whose husband was killed on the field of battle. I see no reason for it.

We have made perhaps as much of a fight in this matter as we ought to, although I do not feel like yielding, and I insist a vote should be had when a quorum of the House is present. I am not disposed to be factious, but I think that such a grave precedent should not be established. If we should take that step, we should not do it without due deliberation, without the action of a quorum of the House. I suggested the other night this bill should be reported to the House favorably, with the understanding the previous question should be moved after we get into the House, so the bill should stand first in order as unfinished business, giving it the right to be called up first of all the bills on the Calendar in the order of unfinished business.

It seems to me that is all that ought to be asked. I do not feel we ought to go beyond that point. I do not think it would be doing justice to the Government; because if $50 is given in this case, how can the House refuse to give the same pension to the widow of an officer or soldier who fell on the field of battle? How can it be done? I can see no reason for it. Are we here for the purpose of legislation on this matter with favoritism? Certainly not, where there is no element of lifetime service, where there is no pretense this man after he left the Army, or, being a volunteer, if he had not left it, stood higher before the law or had any greater claim than the man who was killed in battle with a gun in his hands. I can see no reason for it.

I wish to say as I said the other night, whenever a single bill involving a pension was called up where there has been a difference of views between gentlemen as to whether the pension ought to be granted, and a gentleman asked the bill be laid aside or passed over informally, or if it was seen fit it might be reported to the House and be voted on when a quorum was present, and no one has ever objected.

It seems to me that ought to be the course taken with this bill, and I think it is a right thing to do because it is a grave precedent. If the House shall see fit with a quorum of its members present to pass the bill, I should be better satisfied and I think the members of the House also.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I think I have attended faithfully almost every Friday evening's session that has been held since the order which has just been read for that purpose was made by the House, and the gentleman from Indiana will bear witness that I have co-operated as far as I was able with the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions in the passage of all their bills. I have never during all of these sessions interposed the objection that no quorum was present even when as many as eighty bills were passed in one evening with no more than twenty-five or thirty, certainly not more than forty, of the members of the House present in their seats.

What are the facts of this case? I claim in the first place that Congress should reserve to itself the right of exercising its discretion in dealing with this subject, and that cases which are exceptional in their character, cases of peculiar merit such as this, should be disposed of under the exercise of that discretion of which Congress should never divest itself. In the present case the Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported adversely to the bill, and yet the committee were overruled in their recommendation by the majority of the House then present at the time when this bill was presented for the consideration of the committee.

In the discussion that took place it was shown that there was another bill pending upon the Calendar involving the same principle that is involved in this one—I refer to the Cushing bill—which presents also a case of peculiar merit, and should form an exception to the rule ordinarily laid down in legislative proceedings. We have been asked to pass these bills aside, to dispose of them in such a manner that it was inevitable they never could be reached during this session of Congress, in order that the other bills reported by the committee might take precedence. I did hope, sir, that the committee on Invalid Pensions, seeing that a majority, less, it is true, than a quorum, differed with them in their conclusions on this bill, would extend the same courtesy, the same equity toward these two bills that has been shown toward the consideration of other bills reported by the committee when less than a quorum followed their advice and accepted their report.

I have no wish to impede the passage of any other bill; and I say now in answer to the gentleman from Indiana that if he will place this bill in a situation before the House so that it can be considered at this session of Congress, and so that we may have final action on it before the session closes, then I am quite willing to concede the point and go on with the consideration of other measures reported from that committee with the number of members who may be present this evening, whether it be less or more than a quorum.

But unless that can be agreed to I feel that I should be doing injustice to this claimant if I permitted this bill to be defeated in that indirect manner, as well as the one to which I at first referred, each of which present peculiar reasons why this increase of pension asked for should be given. And we are not without precedent for granting this increase, as the gentleman from Indiana has conceded. Such exceptions have been made by the committee in other instances. That is all I contend for. If this committee, which has not a quorum present, will agree, in the spirit of fair play as I think, toward these two applicants for increased pension, to have an expression of the sentiment of the House so that a quorum may vote upon the bills, that is all I could possibly ask. But I never can consent that either of these bills shall be passed aside and killed by indirection. Therefore I shall continue to raise the question of a quorum unless I have the opportunity, as I have said, of securing a vote in the House at this session. I am quite willing that the sense of the House shall be taken when a quorum is present upon a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. MATSON. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to ask if the previous question is ordered in the House if that will not give this bill a kind of precedence, so as to come up for action in that shape?

Mr. RANDALL. I think not now. That might have been the case at the last Friday evening session. But I have believed that we shall adjourn on the day before the next Friday meeting. I am struggling, as far as in me lies, to that end with the hope of successfully accomplishing it.

I repeat, all that I ask, then, is that this bill, or these two bills rather, to which reference has been made, shall be placed in such a condition that a vote of the House may be taken upon them at some time prior to the adjournment of this session; and if I permit the session to adjourn without some action upon them I would feel that I had been guilty of sacrificing the interests of these two petitioners.

As I have said, I have sat here night after night during the whole session to facilitate the passage of pension bills, and do not now feel warranted in relinquishing my efforts in behalf of these claimants.

Mr. MATSON. So far as I am concerned, and I suppose I may speak for the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I wish to say we shall not object to a vote being taken on the bill at any time when there is a quorum present and it can be called up. We will be ready in any way to facilitate a vote being taken upon it. I am willing to move the previous question to-night on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. That would make it go over till next Friday, when the same class of business shall be taken up.

Mr. MATSON. Let there be an understanding that it will be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. I would be willing to agree to that.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I object.

Mr. MATSON. We can not make that agreement in the committee, but I suppose by arrangement we will have no difficulty in making it in the House.

I desire, in response to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to say that all of us feel obliged to him for his assistance in these matters, because what he has stated is true in every sense of the word; he has been here, I believe, every Friday night, and has yielded to the committee the most cordial support. But when we come to differ with him there we do not agree.

Mr. RANDALL. When you come to differ with me I do not think the same kindness is extended to me as I extended to you.

Mr. MATSON. Perhaps the gentleman has not differed with the committee, but others have; the others have only claimed what we ask now, and it has always been accorded to them.

Mr. RANDALL. I think when the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is reversed in the House—and I say so without making any offensive criticism upon them at all—then they themselves having been the recipients of so much consideration ought to extend back to those who support the claims of these two petitioners a like consideration.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that some of the gentlemen who have asked for a quorum have been gentlemen whose bills have been passed by the committee; but they had a conscientious scruple and thought some particular bill ought not to pass.

Mr. RANDALL. I only ask that this bill shall not be killed by indirection. If you will agree to have a vote in the House some time during this session there need not be a moment's delay in coming to an agreement.

Mr. MATSON. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that whenever he desires to vote on this bill in the House, and there is a quorum present, I shall second every motion he makes to that end; and I apprehend every gentleman present will agree to that, so that we may get over this difficulty.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has had about as much to do in making the rules of this House as any man I know of.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to break them in this case by passing this bill over.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the gentleman can not reach the bill he desires to pass it is the fault of his rules, or the rules which he and others who have co-operated with him have induced the House to adopt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on last Friday night, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania had consented to pass over this case, a large number of pension bills in favor of worthy petitioners that ought to have been passed would have gone through the House; and the bill that the gentleman is in favor of would have been right where it is to-night; it would have been the very first bill to be called to-night, just as it has been. But by his objection on last Friday night to laying this bill aside he has prevented—not intentionally, it is true, but he has nevertheless prevented—the passage of a number of pension bills that ought to have been passed, and he has not forwarded this bill one particle. If this bill had been laid aside last Friday night it would have occupied to-night the very position it occupies here now.

If the gentleman persists in refusing to have this bill passed over what does he effect? Not the passage of this bill; not the granting of a pension here. But he prevents the passage of a number of bills to which there would be no objection at all.

I have always been inclined to act upon the principle that when I find I can not get what I want I then take the next best thing I can get. The gentleman knows that no one member of this House to-night can prevent any action upon this bill. But, Mr. Chairman, while I am opposed to this bill, while I do not believe it ought to pass, and while I believe, with the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that there should be no distinction between the widows of officers and the widows of private soldiers, I shall interpose no objection to action on this bill here to-night.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Alabama has alluded to my connection with the rules of this House. The rules of this House provide that bills shall be taken up in order to be disposed of. I am resisting the vacation of this rule to the injury of two petitioners.

The gentleman says that the bill stands in exactly the same condition now that it did; that I am preventing the passage of other bills to which there is no objection. Why, sir, last Friday evening when we were likely to reach a conclusion, that I hope may yet be reached tonight, that the House may be allowed to vote upon this bill with a quorum, the gentleman from Alabama, if I remember rightly, objected to that procedure, and did not take the course which he advises that I should take to-night, and submit when he could not get things his own way. Now, I am willing to do anything to facilitate any pension bills, and I have been here all through this session assisting their passage. But I am not willing to stand here and see two petitioners for pensions indirectly injured when I can, in the exercise of my right under the rules, secure consideration in the House for those two persons.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Suppose that every other gentleman takes the same position here that you do, and calls for a quorum on this or any other bill, is it possible to pass any bill here to-night? The rules require a quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say to the gentleman that on principle I do not believe that less than a quorum of the House of Representatives should ever complete legislation. But I have stood here all this session making an exception in that respect in behalf of pension bills.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Facilitating the passage of every one that you approve.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. I do not want my friend to assert any such thing as that, because he perfectly well understands that I never stand here objecting to any pension bill if I have a reasonable chance to vote in favor of it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is it in order now to have a call of the roll?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand that the question of a quorum has been raised.

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing has transpired in the committee to develop the fact that there is no quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why not proceed to test that question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the question on the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I believe that last Friday night I interposed the point that no quorum was present. I withdraw that now.

Mr. RANDALL. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. It does seem to me that we ought to arrive at some conclusion in this matter in order to enable us to go on with business.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROBINSON] and to other members present that, as I understand it, we have come to a conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the proposition now pending. The question is on the amendments submitted by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table?

The question was taken by a viva voce vote, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do lie upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a division upon that. My understanding was that the bill was to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Allow me to make one remark.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again put the question. Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do lie upon the table, according to the recommendation of the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. RANDALL. On that I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 25.

So (no further count being called for) the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do lie on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that we will try the matter in the House.

JOHN H. COOK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2635) granting a pension to John H. Cook.

Mr. CONNOLLY. This bill has been reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I am not willing to have it considered to-night, and ask consent that it be passed over informally, not to lose its place upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MRS. KATE L. CUSHING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2429) to place the name of Mrs. Kate L. Cushing, widow of the late Commander William B. Cushing, on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of Mrs. Kate L. Cushing be placed on the pension-roll, and that she be, and hereby is, entitled to receive $50 per month from the passage of this act during the period of her natural life.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the report in this case had better be read.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The petitioner, who is now receiving a pension of $30 per month, asks an increase to $50, to continue during her natural life. This request is based upon the past action of Congress, in that it has in many instances favored in like manner the widows of officers who have rendered valuable and distinguished services to the country. That Commander Cushing was of this class the records of the Navy Department and the history of the late war attest. His is a reputation not only national but world-wide, and no history of the United States would be complete without a page being devoted to his gallant exploits.

William B. Cushing was appointed a midshipman in 1857, commissioned as a lieutenant July 16, 1862, and on December 5, 1863, was detached and ordered to command the Monticello, and continued in commaad of that vessel and others until his promotion to lieutenant-commander October 27, 1864; promoted to commander January 31, 1872; died at Washington, D. C., December 17, 1874.

Report of Secretary of Navy for 1864 shows that Lieutenant Cushing, while in command of the Monticello, sunk the rebel ram Albemarle on the night of October 28, 1864. The records of Navy Department show Lieutenant Cushing was advanced thirty numbers and promoted to lieutenant-commander from October 27, 1864.

Surgeon-General United States Navy reports that Commander Cushing died December 17, 1874, of acute mania. The disease originated in the line of duty from exposure and high excitement during the Southern rebellion, since which time some symptoms of a disordered brain have been noticed by his brother officers. The disease developed into acute mania about four weeks ago, and December 17, 1874, he became so violent that it was necessary to convey him to the Government Hospital for the Insane, where he died at 2.30 p. m.

A brief history of Lieutenant Cushing's valuable services is given in Hamersly's Records of Living Officers of the United States Navy, which shows the bravery and persistence of this accomplished officer. It says that—

"On the 23d of November, 1862, Lieutenant Cushing, then in command of the steamer Ellis, entered New River Inlet, with orders to capture the town of Jacksonville, intercept the Wilmington mail, take possession of any vessels found in the river, and to destroy any salt works found on its banks. At 1 p. m. he reached the town of Jacksonville, captured twenty-five stand of public arms, a large mail, and two schooners. He then started down the river, shelling a rebel camp on his way, and came to anchor about five miles from the outer bar, it being impossible to take the steamer from the river that night. On the following morning the enemy opened on him two pieces of artillery from a bluff, but were soon silenced, the Ellis passing within short range without receiving fire. At about five hundred yards from this point the Ellis grounded, and every effort was made to get her afloat, but without success. Everything was removed from the steamer excepting the pivot-gun and a few small arms; the crew were called to muster and told that they could get aboard the prize schooner.

Lieutenant Cushing then called for six volunteers to remain with him on board the Ellis and fight the remaining gun. Six men came forward, two master's mates, Valentine and Barton among the number. The schooner was ordered to drop down the channel and await the termination of the impending engagement. On the morning of the 25th the enemy opened a cross-fire on the Ellis from four points with heavy rifled guns, so disabling the vessel that the only alternatives left were surrender or a pull of one and a half miles in a small boat under fire to the schooner; the latter alternative was chosen. Lieutenant Cushing fired the Ellis, reached the schooner, and made sail for sea, and four hours later arrived at Beaufort. The coolness, courage, and conduct of Lieutenant Cushing was specially commended in the official reports of Commander H. K. Davenport and Acting Rear-Admiral S. P. Lee, commanding North Atlantic blockading squadron.

"On the night of the 27th of October, 1864, Lieutenant Cushing ascended the Roanoke River in a torpedo-boat, having the second cutter of the steamer Shamrock in tow, for the purpose of blowing up the rebel ram Albemarle at Plymouth. He passed the rebel steamer Southfield without being noticed, and arrived within a short distance of the ram before he was discovered, when he cast loose the cutter, ordering her to board the Southfield and capture the picket stationed there while he attacked the ram with the torpedo. Although the enemy kept up a severe fire of musketry and with howitzers mounted on the wharf, he succeeded in exploding his torpedo under the Albemarle at the same instant that the gun of that vessel to which they were directly opposite was fired on the torpedo boat, which immediately filled, and the lieutenant ordered his officers and men to save themselves and jumped overboard. Most of the party were captured, some drowned, and only two escaped. Lieutenant Cushing managed to reach the shore, and after some hours' travel through the swamps, came to a creek, where he took possession of a boat belonging to a picket of the enemy, and by 11 o'clock the next night had made his way out to the steamer Valley City. For this daring act Lieutenant Cushing received a vote of thanks from Congress and a highly complimentary letter from the Secretary of the Navy."

It has been a rule of this committee to refuse to increase the pension of widows whose husbands' rank was beneath that of a general officer, and they feel that it would be unwise to make a departure in this case. They fully recognize the valuable services of Commander Cushing. His gallantry and bravery in the hour of his country's danger will ever be preserved as a bright spot in history, and his countrymen can not but refer to it with pleasure and pride. Moreover, the committee regret that the rule prevents a favorable recommendation to the request of the deserving widow, but under the circumstances must ask to be discharged from the consideration of the bill, and recommend that it lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do lie upon the table.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. The widow who makes application in this case is from my district in New York. Her husband was a resident of the Thirty-third Congressional district of the State of New York, and went into service from there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it has appealed to gentlemen to preserve order on the floor. If it is in the power of the Chair it intends to have order during this evening's session, and if nothing else will do the Chair will be under the painful necessity of requesting gentlemen by name to be seated and to stop conversation on the floor.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I will detain the committee but a few minutes in order to make some statements in regard to this case.

Under ordinary circumstances, Mr. Chairman, and upon ordinary occasions, I think the Committee on Invalid Pensions would be fully justified and unanimously indorsed in reporting this bill as they have. But as there are always exceptions to good rules, I am inclined to think that while the gentlemen who make up the committee may have considered it wisest to make an adverse report on this bill from the committee-room, they will offer no objection to a consideration of the matter in Committee of the Whole House and cheerfully acquiesce in any action which may be taken this evening.

You will observe by the report which was made by my colleague, the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. BAGLEY], that it has been a rule with the committee to refuse to increase the pension of widows whose husbands rank below that of general officer in the Army or commodore in the Navy; and while they recognize the merits of the case under consideration, coupled with the valuable services and gallant conduct of the late Commander Cushing, they deem it unwise to depart from the rule. They close the report with these words: "Moreover, the committee regret that the rules prevent a favorable recommendation to the request of the deserving widow."

Now, gentlemen, you have no such rule in Committee of the Whole House. While we commend the Pensions Committee for the prudence and care with which they scrutinize the great multitude of bills which are submitted to their examination, and while we honor them for the exact justice which they endeavor to mete out to all, we are glad that they offer no opposition to the consideration by you at this time of this bill which is fraught with so much that is vital to the widow and orphan children of the gallant young officer, who deserves so well of his countrymen.

The reading of the report has given you but a single leaf from a volume which might be read in praise of the noble work and gallant conduct of the distinguished gentleman whose renowned and chivalrous achievements during the war of the rebellion as a naval officer commanded the admiration of all his countrymen and on three several occasions procured for him the thanks of the Secretary of the Navy and once of the Congress of the United States. I need not enter into details. Suffice it to say that he captured more blockade-runners and turned over more money to the fund of the Naval Department than any other single officer during the entire war.

With what fertility of brain he conceived, with what care and forethought he made every preparation, supervising the minutest details himself; and with what bold, gallant, and successful promptitude he executed his designs to forever disable the iron-clad monitor Albemarle as she lay at her wharf surrounded by the confederate forces and filled with confederate officers, can never be adequately described. At the time the world rang with the praises of the hero who could almost single-handed achieve what the entire fleet had been unable to accomplish. But I am not going to worry your patience. Suffice it to say, this young man, admired, honored, and beloved, died in an insane asylum from a disability the direct result of his excessive labors, his great exposure, and his indomitable perseverance in the execution of his bold and gallant exploits in the service of his country. By his dashing and successful enterprises the naval fund was increased hundreds of thousands of dollars, and it is from this fund, which he helped so much to create, that we ask you to contribute to the support of his wife and children.

Who was Lieutenant-Commander Cushing? He was born in the State of Wisconsin. With an irresistible desire to accomplish something in the world, at the age of twelve years he secured a place as page upon the floor of this House, and by dint of perseverance he pushed his way into the good graces of the members and secured admission into the Naval Academy at Annapolis. When the war broke out we find him in Washington begging of the then Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Gideon Welles, to be assigned to active and hazardous service in defense of his country. Before he was nineteen years of age he was placed in command of some of the most responsible and dangerous expeditions known to our naval service, and for his bravery, his gallantry, and his uniform success he was promoted from grade to grade until he was made a commander in the Navy. Two months before he was twenty-one years of age he, with his trusted associates, who had always stood by him, accomplished a deed of such daring and difficulty that the world rang with his praises. Yes, before he was twenty-one years of age he planned, perfected, and executed this greatest of his heroic achievements and completely destroyed the iron-clad rebel monitor Albemarle. Allow me to quote from a paper published at the time:

> The Albemarle, as has been mentioned, was an iron-clad of tremendous strength and power, which had already defeated the whole Federal fleet, sunk the Southfield, exploded the boiler of the Sassacus (both ships of the line), engaged nine vessels at one time, with no material injury to herself, forced the surrender of a brigade, and the practical abandonment of the whole region of the Roanoke, by the Union forces. The Government having no iron-clad or any other vessel capable of crossing the Hatteras Bar to encounter her and compete for the supremacy of the sea, everything seemed at the mercy of the Albemarle, and the expense of the squadron which it was necessary to keep there to watch her movements was something enormous.

It was at this time, and in this emergency, that Lieutenant Cushing submitted his plan to Admiral Lee for leave of absence to go to Washington to submit his plans for the destruction of this impregnable monster. His plans were approved, and he was ordered to go to New York to procure the proper vessels and material to carry out his design, which he did, we all know with what terrible disaster to the confederate ram and what brilliant promise to the Union troops.

The aged mother of this gallant young officer is now living in the State of Missouri on the bounty provided for her declining years by the kindly foresight and filial love of her distinguished son. She speaks to you this evening, and says: "I gave my four sons to their country; one only survives a hopeless invalid; one was killed upon the bloody field of Gettysburg while defending his battery in a most desperate hand-to-hand encounter with the confederate troops. One was killed on the Western plains. The other, after having arrived at the acme of his hopes became hopelessly insane and died in an asylum." This venerable woman says to you: "As ye have done it to others, even so do it for my son and his orphan children." This is not a new departure, the precedent has been established, and now let us do this act of justice to the children of this brave and patriotic soldier.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, although it is usually an ungracious thing to oppose the granting of a pension or the increase of a pension to a woman, I feel bound in this case to sustain the report of the committee and to oppose the bill. This estimable lady has been and is now receiving a pension of $30 per month. The bill grants her an increase to $50 per month. The report, so far as it rehearses and commends the praiseworthy conduct of Commander Cushing, I indorse most heartily. But there is another side to the story, and I dare say many members of the House are aware of it.

Commander Cushing was not married to this lady until after the close of the war. For the capture of the Albemarle he received as his share of prize-money, in two payments, the sum of $56,056.27.

There was in 1865 a distribution of the avails of the captured vessel, the rebel ram Albemarle, amounting to $79,944, awarded by the Navy Department. Afterward the parties interested in the distribution of the prize-money thought the appraisal had been too low, and they procured the passage of a bill through Congress in 1872 authorizing a reappraisal of the Albemarle. It was reappraised, and the total valuation of the vessel for redistribution of prize-money was increased to $282,856.80; and a second distribution was made among the captors of $195,836.39.

Now, the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions does not give any information in regard to the share Commander Cushing received out of this large sum of money. I will refer to the record in order to be exactly correct. In the first distribution he received $17,952.58, which was paid to him September 28, 1865. In the second distribution he received $38,103.69, February 27, 1873; making as his share a total of $56,056.27.

It may be said he was fairly entitled to that sum, that it belonged to him because he earned it. I wish, Mr. Chairman, that such were the facts. I wish it were true as a matter of law and fact that this large sum of money which he received had been Commander Cushing's just share of that prize fund. But such is not the fact. According to Attorney-General Pierrepont's well-considered opinion, transmitted to the Secretary of the Navy in 1875, for his guidance in the division of the prize-money among the captors of the Albemarle, and whose views were adopted without dissent by the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress (Report No. 157), also by the Naval Committee of the Forty-seventh Congress (Report No. 90), Cushing was overpaid the sum of $28,742.76. He undoubtedly got that much over and above his lawful and share, it has never been refunded. You will inquire, sir, how this happened. I will tell the committee just how it was done.

A month or two after the destruction of the rebel ram, Lieutenant Cushing, for his bravery and gallant conduct on that expedition, was promoted from the rank of a navy lieutenant to that of a lieutenant-commander, to take effect retroactively, in order that he might receive a larger share of the prize fund. He was promoted in December, 1864, the promotion to take effect as of October 27, 1864, the day of the capture of the hostile vessel. The Secretary of the Navy at that time who granted the promotion also directed the distribution of the prize-money, giving him a share the same as if his rank had been that of a lieutenant-commander at the time of the capture, when in truth and in fact he did not hold that rank at that time nor until several weeks afterward, but on the contrary was only a lieutenant.

Now, the law in relation to the distribution of prize-money is that the captors, whether officers or men, shall receive certain sums proportioned to their rank at the time of the capture. But in plain violation of the statute Commander Cushing was allowed and took the share of a lieutenant-commander, a higher rank than he held when he commanded the expedition which destroyed the Albemarle and a much larger sum than his actual rank entitled him to receive. The amount he got beyond what lawfully belonged to him was, as I have already said, over $28,000. Why the division of this fund was managed in the way it was is beyond my comprehension. It can not be justified upon any sound legal principle.

In view of the fact that this lady has already been allowed a pension of nearly $1 a day all the year round, in view of the fact that she married Commander Cushing some time after the war was over, and in view of the additional fact that out of this single expedition—grand and glorious though it was, indeed—Commander Cushing received the large sum of $56,000 and upward, more than $28,000 of which he was not entitled to, it would seem we might well pause a little before granting his widow this increase of pension to $50 a month.

In the State of New Hampshire lives a man whose name is Daniel G. George. He was one of the seamen who volunteered under the command of Lieutenant Cushing when he set out on the expedition to capture the Albemarle. George was in the boat with Cushing when the torpedo was exploded by which the Albermarle was disabled, and was himself blown into the water by the explosion with the rest of the boat's crew and was taken prisoner. He did not escape with officers Haworth and Cushing. Now, this man George, an ordinary seaman, who bravely volunteered to go with Lieutenant Cushing on this expedition, enlisted as early as September 17, 1861, and having served continuously four years, six months, and sixteen days, was honorably discharged April 26, 1866. During this long service he was engaged in twenty-one different battles, and was severely wounded. After the war he was allowed a pension of $12 a month for a fracture of his right thigh while in the service. He filed an application for an increase later on, the examining surgeon certifying that his disabilities were equivalent to the loss of a hand or a foot, but it was rejected at the Pension Office. To-day he is an old man, in a crippled condition, unable to support himself by his own labor. He went through all this gallant and extraordinary service for his country and was blown into the water by the explosion of the torpedo that destroyed the Albemarle and then was taken prisoner, and is in humble circumstances so far as property is concerned, yet the last Congress only granted to this man a pension of $24 a month. All he received in both distributions of the Albemarle prize-money was $4,593.60, while his true and lawful share was $6,698.20, and there is still due him $2,104.60, which was unlawfully paid over to Cushing, Haworth, and Gay.

Now, as I have said, it is an ungracious thing to oppose the allowance of a pension to a woman. But I would be neglectful of my duty to this crippled veteran soldier, now living in humble circumstances in a little town in New Hampshire, receiving only $24 a month, if I should consent to vote this lady $50 a month and leave old Dan George out in the cold. [Applause.]

I say let us give that brave soldier and seaman Dan George a pension of $50 a month if we are to grant it to this widow.

Another thing, if it were suggested here that this lady really needed this pension for her comfortable support I am not sure but I would be inclined to favor the bill; but, sir, there is nothing of the kind suggested from the beginning to the end of the report that Mrs. Cushing actually needs the proposed increase of $20 per month in order to maintain herself and family comfortably.

Again, sir, let me call attention to the action of the House within the last three or four weeks. I had the honor to introduce a bill here granting a pension of $75 a month to Harriet P. Dame, of New Hampshire, an army nurse, one of the most noble women of our land. I want to read right here an extract from a letter written to me by General Gilman Marston, of the Second New Hampshire Volunteers, and afterward brigadier-general, and formerly a distinguished member of this House, advocating the granting of a pension to Miss Dame:

Miss Harriet P. Dame went out with the Second New Hampshire Volunteers in June, 1861, and remained with that regiment and in the army hospitals till after the close of the war. She sought no soft place, but wherever her regiment went she went, often marching on foot and camping without tent on the field. She was always present where most needed, and to the suffering, whether "Yank" or "Grayback," it made no difference, she was truly an angel of mercy. Miss Dame was the bravest woman I ever knew. I have seen her face a battery without flinching, while a man took refuge behind her to avoid the flying fragments of bursting shells. Of all the men and women who volunteered to serve their country during the late war not one is more deserving of reward than Harriet P. Dame.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I tried my level best to have the Committee on Invalid Pensions report a bill allowing Miss Dame a pension of $50 a month; but our committee said, "No; we can not give her more than $25 per month;" and both the House and Senate have approved the committee's decision by passing the bill for that sum only. Miss Dame is nearly 70 years of age, with scanty means, her health seriously impaired by the severe hardships and labors of four years of army life. In her case the sum allowed is small, indeed, when compared with the value of her patriotic services in saving the lives and alleviating the sufferings of sick and wounded men and officers all through the war. I maintain if this bill increasing Mrs. Cushing's pension is adopted you surely ought by all the dictates of good sense and justice to include the names of Harriett P. Dame and Daniel G. George with that of Widow Cushing.

Now, sir, I concur in the views expressed by my distinguished friend [Mr. MATSON] the chairman of the committee, that the idea of giving these large pensions to the widows of officers and granting to hundreds and thousands of poor soldiers' widows all over the country the scanty pittance of only $8 a month is intolerable. It ought not to be thought of for a moment. I am not in favor of such favoritism in legislation. It is just as hard for the widow of the soldier who fought in the ranks on land or the widow of an ordinary seaman who lost his life in the service of his country on the high seas to work her way through the world in poverty and destitution as it is for the widows of high commanding officers who drew their thousands and tens of thousands in salaries and prize-money. Officers are brave, I know, and so are soldiers and seamen, too.

I do not know why this bill should be singled out in favor of Widow Cushing while hundreds of widows in humbler circumstances have to be content with $8 per month.

Certainly a stronger equity existed in favor of the widow of Colonel Hendricks, whose bill you have just rejected, than in favor of the beneficiary of the bill now before the House. Colonel Hendricks was shot dead while leading his men into action. You have decided that his widow's pension shall not be increased beyond $30 per month. Commander Cushing survived all the dangers and perils of the war, received liberal compensation for his services and nearly $60,000 of prize-money besides, and he was not married until some time after the war had ended. I insist that the action of the committee in reporting this bill adversely shall be sustained. Before we pass any more bills increasing the pensions of officers' widows beyond $30 a month let us hasten to pass the bill already on the Public Calendar increasing the pension allowed to the common soldier's widow from $8 to $12 a month.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, it is very probable that Mrs. Kate L. Cushing, the widow of the distinguished officer (Commander William B. Cushing) who died in an insane asylum, could live and rear her infant children without an increase of pension, but I think something is due them as a national recognition for the very distinguished services rendered the Union cause by the husband and father. He died December 17, 1874, from causes resulting from his services in the war.

There are very few, Mr. Chairman, who have lived in this country who embraced or sought out an opportunity of performing a deed so gallant and daring as did this officer, Commander Cushing. The list is certainly very short, and probably in future wars, if wars shall come, and I trust they will not, there will be no more marked act of distinction performed under the most trying circumstances than this action of Commander Cushing in destroying the rebel ram Albermarle.

It is all very well to talk about the duty we owe to the private soldiers and to the widows and to the orphan children of other officers and men; it is all very proper and becoming to take notice of that; but when we survey the whole field we get no parallel to this case.

Mr. COX, of New York. There is nothing like it in the history of that war.

Mr. KEIFER. We get no parallel in any point of view, and it will be a shame and a disgrace to the American people, brave, honorable, and generous as they are, if they do not in some way—and in this way if in no other—recognize to the country and to the world the gallant exploits of Commander Cushing.

They say this widow was not his wife at the time he served in the Navy. That may be. But, Mr. Chairman, she is the mother of his infant orphan children, charged with the duty of rearing them as they should be reared. In the veins of her children run the blood of America's most gallant and daring naval officer. It is due to these children, and it is a very fine point and a closely drawn distinction to say this widow shall not receive for herself and for the benefit of her children, yet young, who are to be reared, this small pittance from the hands of the Government.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Is there anything before the House whatever on the record to show that this widow of the dead soldier ever had any children?

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman mean to ask if this woman is the mother of two small children?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. My inquiry was whether there was any evidence of that kind before the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I supposed that all understood the fact, and that it was not denied. In response to the gentleman from New York I will say that I have not been very familiar with the reports in this case and am not able to say whether that fact is contained in the report or not, but my friend on the right, the gentleman's colleague from New York [Mr. BREWER], knows the parties well and can answer the question.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I understand the gentleman who drew the report says that there is no such fact stated in the report, and, as I gathered from the reading of the report, there does not appear to be anything in support of the statement. It is true that mere verbal statements are not of very much weight unless fortified by the personal knowledge of the person who makes the statement.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not state the fact upon my personal knowledge, but will give way to my friend on the right, who knows the facts in the case, and he can inform the gentleman.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. Lieutenant-Commander Cushing had two children, one about 10 years old and the other some two years older, just coming on the stage of life where they need education and care, while the mother has not means sufficient to care for them as they should be, although as stated here it is true she is not poor, that is to say that she is not in indigent circumstances; but to rear her children in the way in which they should be reared and in the same station of life in which she herself was reared and in which the children of such a father ought to be reared she has not the means.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that will be satisfactory to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. It is alleged by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. RAY] that another gentleman accompanied this expedition who is not receiving so large a pension as is proposed to be paid to Commander Cushing. Now I do not intend to speak to-night about what that other gentleman did or what he has pretended since the war to have done. I think I have a distinct recollection of having seen a statement once of his, in which he undertook to describe how the Albemarle was sunk, and how often they sailed around the vessel before he did certain things toward blowing up and sinking the vessel. Yet in contradiction of the statement I learn from every other source that the rebel ram was fastened to the shore, so it would be impossible to sail around it and make the observations he claimed to have made. But that is entirely immaterial to the question here. I have no doubt that he was a brave man, and yet I am told that he sailed under an assumed name at that time for reasons no doubt sufficient to himself.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment I will explain to him why that was.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no doubt the statement of the gentleman will be quite satisfactory. I am entirely willing to accord to him all honor for his bravery, but I can not accord to him the credit of planning and sinking the Albemarle.

Lieutenant Cushing conceived the idea, worked it out in his brain, and sought out and converted higher officers of the Government to the plan that he could sink the rebel ram that the whole nation dreaded. He looked up the officers who were necessary to give consent, and overcame their conservatism. He pursued his purpose until he was on the very spot there himself guiding the torpedo that exploded under that vessel. Of course he was aided by brave men who were about him; but these brave men would have accomplished nothing but for the gallantry and conception of this distinguished officer. What we owe to this man in destroying that vessel we know not to-day.

But it is said that he received prize-money. It is claimed that he received more than he was entitled to. If I understood the gentleman from New Hampshire aright he said Lieutenant Cushing received more than he was entitled to under the law. Yet I understand the officers of the Government, under the advice of the law officers as well as of the judges of the courts, awarded him every dollar which he received. It is said and claimed that because the rank was given to antedate the period of appointment that should cut him off. That is the opinion of the gentleman from New Hampshire; but it seems the officers of the Government, used to administering the law, had an entirely different view of the law on that subject.

But, Mr. Chairman, he received only prize-money that he had earned, and but for his services and his gallantry in the capture of rebel blockade-runners there would have been no prize-money to distribute. Others of course contributed to the capture of the vessel, but that should not weigh a feather now as against his widow and orphan children. There is nothing in that claim.

I do not think I shall dwell upon the suggestion that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has in its committee-room an established rule that only the widows of officers of certain rank—I believe the rank of colonel or above—should have a pension of $50 per month. I believe it goes down as low as colonel.

Mr. MATSON. No, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. Then it applies to those above colonel, I am to understand. That is a purely arbitrary rule, and it is upon a false basis, in my opinion. Of course we have to establish arbitrary rules, but I think no arbitrary rule should come to cut off giving pensions to the widows and children of those who earned them purely through gallantry and distinguished services. I think that the mere rank ought not to determine. There were plenty of officers above the rank of colonel who personally deserved nothing on account of their services or their gallantry, and I agree with the gentleman from New Hampshire that there were plenty of men who served in the ranks, carrying the knapsack, the musket, and the cartridge-box, who earned everything the Government could award to them afterward or to their children after them.

I think the rule is too arbitrary. It ought at least to except those who rendered such services as to cause the Congress of the United States at the time to give them a vote of thanks, as in the case of Commander William B. Cushing for destroying the rebel ram Albemarle on October 28, 1864, at Plymouth, on the Roanoke River. Such an officer should at least stand on a par with the ordinary general officer. Mr. Chairman, I have talked altogether beyond the necessities, I hope, of this case, and altogether longer than I had intended.

Mr. PRICE. I fully appreciate the fact that to-day we owe our present prosperous condition not entirely to the efforts of Commander Cushing; not entirely to the brigadier-generals; not entirely to the officers, but to our whole American Army. I have no means of measuring our gratitude. Our bounty to every one of them should be as boundless and our gratitude as broad as their gallantry was conspicuous. But I must take exception to the style of discussion that is sometimes indulged in when we undertake to show our gratitude to these people. The gentleman from Ohio on my right [Mr. KEIFER] says that there should be some recognition. Permit me to show you that there has already been abundant recognition of Lieutenant Cushing's claims upon the gratitude and bounty of the American people. There has been recognition at all events.

The gentleman thinks the effect on the future would be disastrous if we were not to show that we fully appreciated the herculean efforts put forth and the gallant deeds performed by this distinguished gentleman by which results so satisfactory were produced. I will ask the gentleman if the results would be disastrous, what would be the other results arising from the fact that we after this war is over, after the toils and sufferings have been endured, that we should stand here as an American Congress and single out as the special objects of our favoritism the men who wore the stars and the bars against the men who trudged through the mud and carried the musket? Where will you get the soldiery to stand between the generals and danger if after we get through the war we accord recognition alone to the men who commanded and not to the men who obeyed?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman requires to direct his inquiry to some other gentleman than myself, because I entirely agree with him that we should look to the services rendered and not to the fact whether the stars and bars were borne by those who rendered them.

Mr. PRICE. I appealed to the gentleman from Ohio because he said the effect in the future would be disastrous if we failed to make this recognition.

Permit me to suggest that my reason leads me to the conclusion that the effect would be infinitely more disastrous if we make a distinction and make it between those in the humbler and those in the higher grades of service. I do not care where you draw the line; I do not care what rule you establish. You may give them all you please, and I will indorse every proposition for that purpose. But I want one inflexible rule established by which we shall recognize the fact that the nerves of the man who carried the musket were as sensitive, the blood as red, the feelings as acute, and the necessities as great as were those of the man who commanded him. That is all I want.

Bring them all to the same standard—no matter what the standard may be—treat them all alike, and if you have revenue enough to meet the emergency give it to them. But make an inflexible rule; treat them all alike. Any other system than that is unjust, impolitic, and will be as disastrous in its consequences in the future as the gentleman has indicated it would be if we failed to recognize fully the services of this man.

I do not care whether he got more prize-money than he was entitled to or not. It is said that he got $53,000; he is welcome to it. If he got more he would be welcome to it. What I object to is making any distinction between the man who commanded and the man who was commanded. That is all I have to say on that point.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PRICE. I have not got through yet; and you will not take a vote until I get through. [Laughter.] I have no desire to talk much longer on this question. I have my own ideas and reasons which guide my vote against the crowd which will go in a given direction, and which has gone in that direction a dozen times in this Congress, and will go again, simply because they say that something is due to position, to situation, and to rank. That is the rock upon which this Republic will split before the child now born shall die, unless we guard against it. We are collecting large revenues from the people in order to distribute it among privileged classes, because they occupy official positions. I am tired of this talk about the great revenue being needed in order to properly sustain public officers of high grade in positions becoming their rank. I am tired of it.

I say to you that the man who blacks the boots of the President has blood just as good, nerves just as sensitive as the President himself. While the President occupies that position pay him for it. But when he dies I would make no distinction between the wives and children of those two men.

The higher the service performed by a man the higher the price we pay him. But, when he is dead, then let his widow and children be put upon the same level as others. Any other course than that will alienate from us the affections of the people, without which the Government can not stand.

Mr. RAY, of New York, I would like to inquire, Mr. Chairman, if it will be in order at this time to offer an amendment to the pending bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are now in order.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Then I send up an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the name "Kate L. Cushing," wherever it occurs, and insert in lieu thereof the name "Harriet P. Dame."

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. That can not be done. The amendment is not germane to the bill, and of course my friend knows that.

Mr. KEIFER. I think there is a bill pending for the relief of that person.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Then I would like to be recognized for the purpose of making a few remarks upon the merits of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized and will proceed.

Mr. COX, of New York. Do not oppose this bill.

Mr. RAY, of New York. My colleague says "Do not oppose this bill." I dislike to oppose this bill or to oppose any bill which grants a pension to the widow of any soldier, for the benefit of herself or of the minor children of such dead soldier.

While I have been a member of this House, and it has not been a long time, it has been my pleasure, I think, to support every pension bill that I have had an opportunity to vote upon, though some of them did not meet my hearty concurrence.

But when it comes down to the point where I think that not justice but great injustice is being done, not to the particular individual in question but to the great mass of our citizens, by the passage of a bill, I will fearlessly oppose such a measure.

Scattered all over this broad land of ours there are thousands and tens of thousands of widows of soldiers; widows who gave their husbands, widows who gave their sons for their country. They were poor then and they are poor now. Their husbands went out and gave their lives, and left their widows and children penniless; and those widows have toiled on year after year with the needle and otherwise to support themselves and their crying children. They have been and they are to-day unable to educate those children. They have been and they are to-day unable to protect those children from the heat of summer or the storms of winter.

I believe in being generous, but I believe in first being just. When this Congress shall have been just to the thousands and tens of thousands of widows scattered through this country who are to-day in actual want, some of them in the poor-house, some of them with children dependent upon the charity of this people—when this country has been just to them then will I give my vote to be generous to this lady; then and not till then.

If the children come to want I will vote to aid them, but I can not forget the needy, deserving men who so bravely defended this Nation in its hour of peril, and who clamor in vain for aid at the hands of this Government.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that any man upon the floor of this House, for the simple sake of being generous, for the simple sake of having it said that he has not voted against a pension which it is confessed is not needed by this lady or her children to make them comfortable, can afford in the eyes of the people to vote for such a bill until he shall have first seen that such laws have been placed upon the statute-book as shall take care of and well provide for every soldier, every soldier's widow, and every soldier's child who to-day is in penury and want. Mrs. Cushing is rich, her children above want. The $58,000 prize-money given by the law for Commander Cushing's bravery was a fair compensation, and there is no evidence but that he left every penny of it for the support of his widow and children. Mrs. Cushing married him after the war was over, and never suffered a moment's agony on his account.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Chairman, briefly and hastily stated, that I oppose this bill. I oppose it upon this broad principle of what I believe to be justice to the great mass of the soldiers, soldiers' widows and children in this country. I believe that the report of this committee is founded in good sense and justice, and I hope, Mr. Chairman, that it will be sustained.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman—— [cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Gentlemen, do not be in a hurry. I never detain this House long; but I want, if I can—I know it will be very difficult—to answer the labored argument of my friend before me [Mr. PRICE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

There is a sentiment which God Almighty put in the hearts of men when he created them, and it has come along down the stream of time until it has reached us—that the man who does most for his country deserves most of his country's gratitude. [Applause.] Sir, what common soldier—and I am the friend of the common soldier, as I want to show before I sit down—what common soldier in the Revolutionary war stands out as conspicuous as does General Washington? Who did most for his country? And whom did that country love most? To whom was that country the most grateful? I say that General Washington did more than all the gallant soldiers that stood by him and loved him; and it would have been an insult to the men who fought with him in the dark days of the Revolution to have told them that Washington was not the beloved, the honored of all. And, sir, you insult the soldiers of the late war when you tell them that the gallant officer who stood in the front is not the man who should receive honor and gratitude, is not the man whose family should receive such bounty as the Government has to bestow.

Why, sir, the people of the country elected General Jackson President of the United States because he was a gallant soldier. And, gentlemen of the Republican party, you expect to beat us at the coming election with JOHN A. LOGAN on your ticket, because he was a gallant soldier—because he did much as a brave officer. Tell me, now, why did you not take up a private soldier and put him second on your ticket to carry Blaine through? [Laughter and applause.] But you did not do it.

Now I want to talk a little about this— I will not call it demagogy, though if I were to indulge in that kind of language it would be demagogy. I refer to this talk about wanting to do so much for the private soldier. But before referring to that I want to talk a minute about this gallant officer, Commander Cushing. His brain planned the whole expedition by which the rebel ram Albemarle was blown up. It was his brain that did it all. For that the Congress of the United States thanks him. For that this nation thanks him.

But you tell me that this lady married him after the war was over. I do not blame her for marrying him. If I had been a lady, I would have married him too. [Laughter.] But she is the mother, as has been aptly said, of his children, and now the question is will you give this increase of pension to the mother of the children of that gallant officer who in a frail little vessel attacked that great ironclad that had up to that time proved more than a match for the whole Union Navy—this officer whose brain planned and whose bravery executed the expedition that blew up the ram Albemarle. We all thank God for that. Sir, I could not feel myself an American if I voted against a bill of this kind, though of course I know other men may honestly differ with him.

But I want to talk a little about the private soldier, if you please, and also about the lady the gentleman talked about and wished to put on this bill. I voted against the reduction and he voted for it. After that he comes up here now, not as a demagogue, but making the poorest argument I ever heard; that is, he who voted against the bill now comes here and says we ought to have put on the pension-roll this lady's name. I voted for the bill, and I believe I voted for it alone. That is my recollection about it.

You talk about putting a gallant soldier upon the pension-roll. You say he got $25. Introduce your bill—you say he was a good man and brave—and I will vote for it; and, sir, I venture the assertion he will not. [Laughter.] That is the way he voted during the whole time. What is this whole talk about? It is to go to the people. You must talk about the brave soldier. I want to test you here. We voted by a majority to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war. It was a pension for merit, a pension for service. Oh, my heart was in that bill! It is there yet; it is not quite alienated like that of some men. [Applause.] My heart is in that bill.

I wish to see the men who carried our flag into a foreign land, who planted the Stars and Stripes upon the Halls of the Montezumas, the men who vindicated us and the insult to our flag, who avenged the murder of our citizens on the Rio Grande—I wish to see them pensioned, every one of them who survives.

The Senate has taken up the bill, and I see some gentlemen, some who oppose this, and who say, "Oh, they have done such monstrous work we will have to give up the poor Mexican soldier in his old age, and we can not vote for the bill." What have they done? They have amended it by saying that the widow of a private soldier who was killed or died of his wounds in the rebellion shall receive $12 instead of $8. Well, I indorse that, and expect to vote for it; will you? Will you, who talk so much about the poor soldiers?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Every one of us.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I wish to say to the gentleman I will vote to give a pension to every needy and deserving soldier that ever fought anywhere a single day in the armies of the United States; but I will never give my vote for a measure that goes to pension simply the Mexican soldiers and discriminates against those who fought four years in the war of the Rebellion to save the life of the nation. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLFORD. Thank God for all that! I do not thank God for the discrimination, though. [Laughter.] These discriminators generally find something to discriminate about and to vote against a bill. I am not one of them. I do not strain at a gnat and then swallow a camel. I will take the whole camel that has come from the Senate without making a wry face about it, and I will do it to get the Mexican bill.

There is one thing more I wish to talk about. The poor old soldier who fought in the war of the rebellion, and who is now 62 years of age—why not pension him? I will cheerfully vote for that. I hope you will, too. I hope it will so sweeten it that you will vote for the Mexican bill. We will pension him if he is 62 years of age. We will vote for that.

There is another amendment. They have said all disabled and wounded, those who fought for their country, the men you love so——

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WOLFORD. Certainly. I say you love them, and now let us see you show it by your vote.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to say that I am the author of the only one of the bills which pensions every soldier who served in the Army.

Mr. WOLFORD. Are you going to vote for this bill?

Mr. PRICE. I am for a bill that puts them on an equality, and nothing that does not.

Mr. WOLFORD. Now I want to go a little further. It gives to all men who are disabled now, whether they received their wound by a bursting shell, by a cannon-ball, or a musket shot, if they were disabled in the fight in the service of their country—it gives them a pension, and they ought to have it. Can you swallow that? That is for the common soldier. These are the glorious men who went to the front. They are the men who did the fighting, and there are many of them. Let me say to you that the harvest is great, but the laborers are few. Will you come and help to reap the harvest? The opportunity is offered to you now; come and lend your aid. Then it puts aside all of these quibbles that have been raised as to whether a man was sound when he went into the Army, or otherwise.

I believe most of the amendments put on in the Senate are bills that have passed the House. But another thing. Men stand and wonder and say, how can we do it? It will take, they say, according to Commissioner Dudley's calculation, additional millions of dollars out of the Treasury. It will run the cost to such an enormous sum that we can not pay it. Well, I intend to propose an amendment to that, and I hope you will vote for it. I propose to amend the bill of the Senate, and the Senate, I think, will agree to the amendment, by laying an income tax upon every man with an income of over $5,000. That will make money enough to pay all the soldiers, and will thus divide the profits between the men who got rich during the war and those who went into the war and fought its battles.

Mr. PRICE. That is class legislation again.

Mr. WOLFORD. Now, my friend, don't dodge that. [Laughter.] I say levy the amount on the rich, those who got rich when the war was going on, and let them pay it to the soldiers who fought the war. If that is class legislation it is glorious class legislation, and God Almighty will smile when you vote for it and the devil will laugh when you vote on the other side. [Laughter.]

Now, I have said all I want to say. I did want to talk a little about this Mexican pension bill, for if we get the income tax I mean to vote for it, and if we do not get it I intend to vote for it anyhow and trust in God to get the money to pay it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie upon the table.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that a different course be pursued with these bills. I will say in the first instance that I am opposed to the bill; but it is suggested that an arrangement might be made by which this bill should be agreed to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, but with the understanding that no vote should be taken upon it until a quorum is present. That is the desire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]——

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I object.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. We might take a vote upon that proposition in the committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. But when the committee vote it down the probability is that the House will vote it down also. What agreement was made with reference to it?

Mr. MATSON. My friend was not in when the agreement was made. The agreement with Mr. RANDALL included reporting both these bills to the House with favorable recommendation.

Mr. McMILLIN. The action upon the other bill was adverse; the adverse report was sustained by the committee, and so reported to the House. I suppose there can be no agreement as to that bill, and the probability is that this will share the same fate.

Mr. MATSON. I will say again that so far as I am concerned, and I speak of course for myself alone, but in the discussion had before the other bill was acted upon this evening, between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, I understood it to be agreed that this bill too should be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation but no action to be had in the House upon it without the presence of a quorum.

Mr. KEIFER. That was the understanding, I believe.

Mr. McMILLIN. That can not be done. No such agreement can be made.

Mr. MATSON. I agreed of course for myself alone. I will say again that I was opposed to both of these bills. The committee rejected the other bill, but the verbal agreement with the gentleman from Pennsylvania induced me to vote in favor of reporting it to the House with the recommendation that it pass. Now, I think by unanimous consent we might make that order.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I object.

Mr. KEIFER. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MATSON. I shall ask unanimous consent of the House for the action I have suggested.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the proposition to the House.

Mr. MATSON. If the Chair will permit me, I was going to ask unanimous consent that the bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, but with the understanding that a vote should be only taken in the House when a quorum was present and at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. McMILLIN. I object to that. Let the bill take its course before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the proposition.

The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill under discussion be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, but with the understanding that the vote to be taken in the House shall be taken only when a quorum is present, and at the earliest practicable moment. Is there objection?

Mr. McMILLIN and Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, objected.

Mr. KEIFER. I move that it be laid aside with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken; the House divided, and there were—ayes 31, noes 36.

Mr. KEIFER and Mr. COX of New York (from their seats). Tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the present occupant of the chair never recognizes a demand for tellers unless the gentleman rises in his seat for the purpose.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I rise and make the point that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BREWER, of New York, and Mr. MATSON were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 29, noes 37.

So the motion of Mr. KEIFER was not agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think that we had better adjourn. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up the Senate pension bills on the Calendar. There are, I think, six of them. If we pass them to-night they will become law.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise in my seat to object.

Mr. KEIFER. I inquire whether under the order those bills may not be taken up? I have been informed the Senate bills may be called up under the order for these evening sessions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the special order to be read.

The special order was again read.

Mr. MATSON. There are six pension bills on the Calendar that have passed the Senate. They were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and have been reported favorably. I think those bills ought to be passed in preference to the others because when they pass the House they become law, while in regard to House bills that may pass the House to-night there is no possibility of their becoming law this session. They may just as well be passed at the next session of Congress as be passed now. I now ask that the Senate bills be taken up first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent——

Mr. COX, of New York. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] tell us how many pension bills have been passed by the House this session?

Mr. MATSON. A little over four hundred.

Mr. RANDALL. And how many of those four hundred have the Senate passed?

Mr. MATSON. I can not say precisely; I think not exceeding fifty.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the proposition. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] asks unanimous consent to take up the Senate pension bills on the Calendar for present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. COX, of New York. The Chair heard my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman objected before the Chair stated the proposition. Is there objection?

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Chair heard my objection twice recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not recognize an objection made out of order; and the gentleman from New York is too good a parliamentarian to ask the Chair to do so.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have the same right as you have, Mr. Chairman, when you are on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has exactly the same right as every other member of the House. But the Chair will not recognize an objection out of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I made the objection in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman made it before the Chair stated the proposition. And the Chair will state to the gentleman from New York it is the purpose of the Chair to enforce the rules of the House as the Chair understands them.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Chair has not understood the rules exactly. [Laughter.]

ELIZABETH CONNOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 411) granting a pension to Elizabeth Connor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Connor, widow of William Connor, deceased, late a private in Captain Paterson Bain's company in the war of 1812.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I would like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. STEELE) of the Committee on Pensions was read in part. In full it is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 6075, after duly considering the same, are of the opinion that Conner was an extraordinarily brave man, and that he was of unusual service to our country in its early history as soldier, scout, spy, and interpreter, and that his aged widow is entitled to a pension under existing laws. Although the official record evidence was lost or burnt, yet from the affidavits of Abraham Williams and James M. Ray, and from history referred to herewith, and all made a part of this report, your committee think the facts are fully established showing that Conner was, as before stated, a brave soldier, and therefore report the bill back and recommend favorable consideration.

STATE OF INDIANA, Marion County:

Marion circuit court.

Before me, Austin H. Brown, clerk of said Marion circuit court, personally came this the 16th day of May, 1878, James M. Ray, a resident of Indianapolis, in said county, aged 77 years on December 23, 1877, who being duly sworn deposeth and saith as follows, to wit:

I became acquainted with William Conner in the spring of the year 1821, and his present widow, Elizabeth Conner, at their family residence on White River, Indiana, four miles south of the present town of Noblesville, he being there engaged as a trader with the Delaware and other Indians, and I then learned from him that he had been long so engaged as a trader with Indians of that region, for many years previous to the war of 1812, and that he was actively engaged as a spy and guide during that war for the United States troops, under the command of General William H. Harrison, in contest with the Indians who had become in that region partially hostile to the United States. That I remained closely intimate with said William Conner until the day of his death, on the 8th of August, 1835; and further, that in the month of June, 1823, I traveled on horseback, in company with the said William Conner, from his said home on White River, Indiana, to Sandwich, Canada, nearly opposite Detroit, Mich., to aid him in settling his account with a British merchant there named McGregor, for goods furnished him by the said McGregor to trade with the Indians just previous to the war of 1812, and while on that journey through the State of Ohio we met a party of several Indians on foot, each dressed in a scarlet blanket which they had just received as their annual present from the British Government in Canada for fighting for said Government against the United States in the war of 1812, and I noticed in passing said Indians that the last one of them stopped short on observing said Conner and scowled sternly at him until we were out of their sight, when the said William Conner remarked to me that it would have been dangerous for him to have met that Indian alone, as his scowl proved that he recognized him as the guide of the United States troops led by Lieut. Col. John B. Campbell to the Mississinwa towns which were burned during the battle of the 18th of December, 1812.

I will also state, as deputy clerk for the circuit court at Connersville, Ind., I issued a marriage license to the said William Conner and Elizabeth Chapman just previous to the 30th day of November, 1820; that I engaged Fielding Hazelrig, esq., a justice of the peace for Fayette County, Indiana, to unite them in marriage.

For further evidence I refer as to the identity of said William Conner's services in the said battle of Mississinwa in December, 1812, to the following extracts from the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell to General Harrison, which will be found on the records and files of the proper Departments in Washington city, which I annex from Dillon's History of Indiana, on pages 511 to 513, to wit:

"At 4 on the morning of the 18th I ordered the reveille to be beaten, and the officers convened at my fire. A short time afterward, while we were in council, and about half an hour before day, my camp was most ferociously attacked by a large party of Indians, preceded by and accompanied with a most hideous yell. This immediately broke up the council, and every man ran to his post. The attack commenced upon that angle of the camp formed by the left of Captain Hopkins's troops and the right of Captain Garrard's, but in a few seconds became general from the entrance of the right to the left of Ball's squadron. The enemy boldly advanced to within a few yards of the lines, and seemed determined to rush in. The guards posted at the different redoubts retreated to camp, and dispersed among their different companies, thus leaving me without a disposable force. Captain Smith, of the Kentucky Light Dragoons, who commanded one of the redoubts, in a handsome and military manner kept his position, although abandoned by half his guards, until ordered to fill up the interval in the rear line between the regiment and squadron.

"The redoubt at which Captain Pierce commanded was first attacked. The captain maintained his position until it was too late to get within the lines. He received two balls through his body and was tomahawked. He died bravely and much lamented. The enemy then took possession of Captain Pierce's redoubt, and poured in a tremendous fire upon the angle to the right and left of which were posted Hopkins's and Garrard's troops. But the fire was as warmly returned. Not an inch of ground was yielded. Every man, officer and soldier, stood firm, and animated and encouraged each other. The fire became warm on the left of the squadron, at which Captain Markle's troops were posted, and the right of Elliott's company, which, with Markle's, formed an angle of the camp, was severely annoyed by the enemy's fire. I had assisted in forming the infantry composed of Elliott's company of the Nineteenth United States Regiment, Butler's Pittsburgh Blues, and Alexander's Pennsylvania Riflemen, and ordered them to advance to the brink of a declivity from which they could more effectually defend themselves, and harass the enemy if they should attempt an attack on that line.

"While I was thus engaged, Major Ball rode up to me and observed that he was hard pressed and must be relieved. I galloped immediately to the left wing with an intention of ordering Captain Trotter's troops to re-enforce the squadron, but was there informed that the enemy was seen approaching in that direction, and believing it improper on second thought to detach a large troop from that line, which also covered an angle of the camp, I determined to give the relief from the infantry. I wheeled my horse and met Major McDowell, who observed that the spies and guides, under the command of Capt. Patterson Baine, consisting of ten men, were unemployed. We rode to them together and ordered Captain Baine to the support of the squadron. Seven of them, to wit, James Adrian, William Conner, Silas McCullough, James Thompson, James Noggs, John Ruland, and Joseph G. McClelland, followed their brave leader and rendered most effectual assistance."

I, James M. Ray, further depose and say that the said Elizabeth Conner, widow of the said William Conner, has remained unmarried since the day of his death; and also further depose and say that I attended and was present at the funeral of said William Conner at Noblesville, Ind., soon after the day of his death, which had occurred on the 8th day of August, 1835; and I also further depose and say that I have a distinct remembrance of the said William Conner stating to me, after my personal acquaintance with him in 1821, that, being a spy and guide to the army of General Harrison in the battle on the Thames on the 5th day of October, 1813, he was called upon by the commanders in that battle at the close of the fight to come forward and ascertain certainly whether one of the Indians killed was really Tecumseh, as it was known by the other spies that he, Conner, had very intimately known him while dealing with the Indians as a trader before the war, and I am confident the name of the said William Conner, as a spy, will be found enrolled in the proper records of the War Office, among the rolls of the spies and guides engaged for the United States in that battle; and doubtless some time after the date of that battle he was honorably discharged.

And I hereby refer to the United States treaty with the Indians, made at Greenville, Ohio, on the 22d day of July, 1814, General William H. Harrison, and Lewis Cass, as governor, being commissioners. The said William Conner is named as one of the sworn interpreters, as will be found and stated in the United States Statutes at Large, No. 7, page 120, on treaties.

JAMES M. RAY.

In testimony of all of which I, Austin H. Brown, clerk of said Marion circuit court, hereunto set my hand and the official seal of said court, at Indianapolis, this 16th day of May, 1878.

[SEAL.] AUSTIN H. BROWN,
Clerk Marion Circuit Court.

STATE OF INDIANA, Marion County:

On this 19th day of July, 1879, comes Abraham Williams, who, being sworn, says that he is now 87 years of age past (born February, 1792); that he served in the Army of the United States in the war of 1812-'13 in Throckmorton's Kentucky militia, for which his name is now inscribed on the pension-rolls of Indianapolis agency as No. 1241 (2) (a) of the date of 18th June, 1871.

He further says that while in the service in the year 1813, in the month of October, and while in Canada, opposite or nearly opposite Detroit, Mich., he met William Conner, whose widow, Elizabeth Conner, is now an applicant for a pension under the act of Congress of ——— —, 1878.

He further says that at that time said William Conner was in the service of the United States as an Indian spy and interpreter, in which capacity he met him on several occasions at and near to the town of Sandwich, in Canada. He does not now recollect to what particular command said Conner was attached in his capacity of spy and interpreter, but understood then and now believes he was attached to the command generally and directed by the commandants to points of necessity. During the stay of affiant at that and other points in Canada near thereto he met said William Conner a number of times and knows that he was engaged in said service for the period in all about ten or fifteen days, and believes that he had been with the command from its organization, and during that time he met said Conner quite a number of times. He afterward in 1825 became a neighbor and well acquainted with said William Conner, and knew him and his family until the death of said William Conner. When he first met said William Conner in Hamilton County, Indiana, he recognized him at once, and on many occasions afterward he and the said William Conner talked over the incidents and circumstances of their meeting in Canada.

He has known the applicant, Elizabeth Conner, for the last fifty years and knows that she is the widow of the said William Conner. Affiant is old and feeble, or he would be able to give other incidents of his acquaintance and intercourse.

I further certify that I have had an acquaintance of about fifty years with said Williams, and have heard him talk about some of the incidents named in this statement more than forty years ago.

The committee move to amend the present bill by striking out the name "Connor" and inserting the name of "Conner," the latter being the proper name of the person in question.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMMA DE LONG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3065) granting a pension to Emma De Long.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma De Long, widow of the late Lieut. Commander George W. De Long, United States Navy, who died in Siberia, while in the discharge of his duty as the commanding officer of the expedition and during the retreat of the officers and enlisted men of the exploring steamer Jeannette, after the wreck of that vessel in the Arctic seas, and to pay to the said Emma De Long a pension at the rate of $50 per month, commencing from the 23d of March, 1882.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the said Emma De Long, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount which shall, upon the passage of this act, have accrued to her under the provisions thereof.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the words "fifty dollars per month," namely, the following:

"Commencing from the 23d day of March, 1882.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the said Emma De Long, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount which shall, upon the passage of this act, have accrued to her under the provisions thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think it is scarcely necessary the report should be read. Every member knows the circumstances under which it is proposed to grant this pension.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. STEELE) from the Committee on Pensions was read, as follows:

The original bill has been slightly amended, and, as amended, the committee recommend its passage. It is not deemed necessary to refer at length to the gallant services of the brave Lieut. Comdr. George W. De Long, who gave up his life while on duty in the frozen wilds of Siberia. The long and painful story of the Jeannette expedition, the gallantry and devotion of the men therein engaged, the horrible suffering to which they were subjected, and finally the death of a number of them in the ice-fields thousands of miles from the country they served so faithfully—all has gone to history, and become a shining chapter in the great record of human heroism. And now the faithful wife of the brave De Long asks at the hands of Congress a pension sufficient to supply the bare necessities of a life darkened and saddened by the Siberian tragedy of which the husband was the central figure.

The committee unanimously and earnestly recommend the passage of the bill as amended granting a pension to Mrs. Emma De Long.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to inquire what was the rank held by this officer.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. He held the rank of lieutenant-commander.

Mr. MATSON. I move to amend by striking out $50 and inserting $30. I do so for the reason that this is precisely the same case as regards rank as that of the pension to the widow of Lieutenant-Commander Cushing. Certainly the services of Lieutenant-Commander De Long were not more conspicuous, gallant, or meritorious.

Mr. STEELE. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana that this lady is very poor, and is dependent upon this pension entirely for her support. That was one of the influences brought to bear upon the committee to induce them to make this report unanimously.

Mr. KEIFER. What amount of pension is it proposed to give?

Mr. STEELE. Fifty dollars per month. This lady will have nothing but what she will get through this pension.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. This is the pension that is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, if this $30 per month is not the uniform pension that is recommended by his committee in cases of similar rank to this?

Mr. MATSON. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] in answer to his question, that it is not frequently the case that committees of Congress are called upon to fix the original sum to be given as a pension to widows. It is more frequently the case that they are called upon to increase pensions already granted.

I know that $30 a month is the amount allowed under the general law to widows of lieutenant-commanders. It is the highest amount allowed under the general law to the widows of officers of the Army or of the Navy. The widow whose case has just been before this House was the widow of a lieutenant-commander, a very gallant and distinguished man in every sense of the word, who certainly rendered as gallant and meritorious services as any officer. My friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] insists that a distinction should be made in this case because the widow is poor.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. There is this difference between the two cases: in the other case Lieutenant-Commander Cushing received the sum of $56,000, while in this case not a dime has been received.

Mr. MATSON. I do not say the two cases are exactly parallel.

Mr. STEELE. And this officer died while in the service?

Mr. MATSON. The one officer died in the service, perhaps, while the other died after having left the service. There are of course differences between the two cases, but there is no difference in the matter of rank. There certainly can be no difference in favor of Lieutenant-Commander De Long so far as gallantry and conspicuous service is concerned; the difference is rather in favor of Lieutenant-Commander Cushing, because the single act by which he destroyed the Albemarle was certainly one of the most conspicuously brave and gallant acts of the whole war of the rebellion.

If you increase this widow's pension simply because she is poor, then how can you refuse to increase the pensions of other poor widows? There are very many thousands of very poor widows who are drawing small pensions.

I understand that Mrs. De Long is not receiving any pension at all now. I am perfectly willing that she shall be given a pension of $30 a month. I repeat again, what I am very loath to do, that I think this matter of increasing pensions beyond the highest amount allowed under the general law is all wrong. I say that without any feeling of demagogy—whether it is demagogy or not. Certainly it is wrong as between those of the higher ranks.

Mr. STEELE. My colleague knows that there are a great many precedents.

Mr. MATSON. Of course I know that, but none in cases of this rank.

Mr. PETERS. This House has to-night adopted a precedent in the case of the widow of Colonel Hendricks, and refused to increase her pension from $30 to $50 a month. I do not see how I can in justice sit here and see that precedent violated without objecting.

Mr. BENNETT. If in order, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill extending its privileges to the family of the assistant surgeon of that expedition who perished at his post, Assistant Surgeon Ambler. I would like to know if that amendment would be in order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. According to the ruling to-night I do not think it would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] reduce his amendment to writing?

Mr. BENNETT. I will do so.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point of order that the amendment indicated is not germane to the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman can introduce a bill for the purpose he has indicated and have it referred to the committee and the committee will report upon it.

Mr. BENNETT. I would respectfully inquire of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] why my amendment is not germane to the bill? These two persons died in the same service.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. This is a bill for the benefit of a particular person, of Mrs. De Long.

Mr. STEELE. This is a particular bill for the benefit of a particular person.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the amendment suggested is in order, then you can make an omnibus bill of this by putting on it a pension for each pending case.

Mr. BENNETT. I send up the amendment which I have reduced to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert these words: "And the mother of Assistant Surgeon Ambler."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is not germane to this bill. This is a bill to pension the widow of Lieutenant-Commander De Long, and for no other purpose. If the amendment proposed is in order to this bill, then every private pension bill before the committee is in order as an amendment, and they can all be put upon one bill. It seems to me that there would be no necessity for our going on and passing individual bills at all; we could just make one omnibus bill and put them all in that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The reason given by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] goes to the point of policy as to what the Committee of the Whole may think it wise to do. As regards the power of the Committee of the Whole, I do not think the point of order is well taken. I see nothing to hinder the committee from putting two names in one bill, if it shall see fit to do so; and if they should report such a bill to the House and the House should pass it and it should pass the Senate, it will be the law of the land. Such an amendment may not meet the approval of some gentlemen here; but if the majority choose to adopt it, I have no doubt it is in order for them to do so. I think numerous precedents may be found where more persons than one have been pensioned in a single bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, and holds that this amendment is germane to this bill. In the case of a bill under discussion to-day in the House a substitute was proposed, bringing in other parties in the same manner as now proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The point now raised is unlike that which was decided by the Chair a little while ago, when a motion was made to strike out one name and insert another. This amendment proposes to add a name, and the Chair knows of no rule under which the point of order can be sustained.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to inquire whether the rules of the House do not require that these bills shall be first considered in a committee?

No bill for the relief of the mother of this assistant surgeon has ever been introduced or considered. If it is in order to add this name why may we not add fifty or sixty others?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not take cognizance of the question whether a bill for the relief of a particular person has been introduced or not. No question of that kind has been presented to the Chair.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point that this matter has not been considered in committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The rules of the House require that bills appropriating money shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole. This is the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAGLEY. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to offer an amendment providing pensions for the widows of all those who perished on that expedition.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The amendments reported by the committee are pending, and had better be voted on first.

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point that no amendments submitted subsequently to that of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] are now in order, as his is an amendment in the second degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question will be upon the amendments reported by the committee, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out at the end of section 1 the words "commencing from the 23d day of March, 1882."

Strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask that the vote on the last amendment be taken first, and then on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty," because if the amount of the pension should be fixed at $30, I believe this House will give the pension from the death of the husband; and if $50 be granted, it will be given only from the passage of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. The rules provide in what order amendments should be acted upon. I think we had better follow the rules.

The question being taken on the amendments reported by the committee, they were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMES. I wish to inquire whether Lieutenant De Long went on this expedition as a volunteer or at the command of the Government; whether he was in the military or naval service during the time he was engaged upon this expedition?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. He went as a volunteer.

Mr. HOLMES. Was this a naval expedition under the charge of the Government solely?

Mr. KASSON. It was under command of a naval officer.

Mr. HOLMES. I understand it was under the charge of Mr. Bennett. I simply make this inquiry for information.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It was under the supervision of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Lieutenant De Long was under the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, and reported to him.

The amendment of Mr. MATSON was read, as follows:

In line 12 of section 1 strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 33, noes 6.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. KASSON. I will remind the gentleman that as these amendments must be acted upon by the House he can have a vote by a quorum at that time, if he so desires.

Mr. STEELE. Understanding that we can have a vote in the House I withdraw my point.

So the amendment of Mr. MATSON was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is on the amendment offered by the gentlemen from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert "and the mother of Assistant Surgeon Ambler."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to amend by adding "and the widows, minor children, and dependent mothers of all those who perished on the expedition."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That would be pretty general. I do not know how you can get at that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is as much propriety in pensioning these as in pensioning the others.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. BAGLEY. I have sent an amendment to the desk which I ask may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Also, to William Chipp, father of Lieutenant Chipp.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make the point of order that this amendment proposes to grant a pension to a party who is not named on this Calendar; and according to the order under which we are now proceeding the case can not be considered to-night. I ask for the reading of the order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the special order.

The order was again read.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I move that the committee do now rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 23.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now send up my amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That order was made by unanimous consent, and we have a right to presume when it was made that it was to consider bills reported by a committee and which had been investigated by a committee. If you can amend these bills by inserting other parties' names whose cases have not been examined and reported on, then the order is nugatory. You can then bring in the names of all applicants whose cases have never been considered at all and who have no bill on the Calendar and put them on.

Mr. STEELE. Let me call attention to a paragraph on page 224 of the Digest, where it says, "It is also out of order to ingraft upon a bill for the relief of one individual a provision for the relief of another."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no hesitation in ruling against the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Illinois. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the widows, minor children, and dependent mothers of all the persons who perished on the Jeannette expedition which was commanded by Lieutenant De Long.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That is a general bill and covers a class.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAGLEY. I move the following: "Also to Warren Chipp, father of Lieutenant Chipp."

Mr. CUTCHEON. I make the same point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has called attention to a note on page 224 of the Digest: "It is also out of order to ingraft upon a bill for the relief of one individual a provision for the relief of another."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is not the rule.

Mr. STEELE. It is a journalized decision.

The CHAIRMAN. But it does not state where the amendment is germane and of the same character; it can not be done. The Chair adheres to its original decision, and rules the amendment of the gentleman from New York in order.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I move the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 27.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to say a single word on the amendment. I think as a matter of correct practice we ought not to report a claim, whether for a pension or otherwise, for anybody until we know of the existence of the person through some committee of the House and know enough of the facts to be willing to pension them on an original bill. If this gentleman had simply offered a bill in committee that a pension be granted to A B or C D none of us would think of acting or voting on it; yet that is the proposition here. The gentleman suggests a name when we do not know officially of the existence of the person to be pensioned.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to say one word. It strikes me it is making an unjust discrimination against others who lost their lives on that expedition. There is as much reason and right to give pensions to the minor children and dependent mothers or fathers of the others who perished on that expedition as to those of Surgeon Ambler or Lieutenant Chipp. It would have been vastly more proper to adopt the amendment I offered which covers all these cases, Surgeon Ambler's as well as Lieutenant Chipp's and all others.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. We do not know there are any minor children. We do not know whether any of these parties left a widow or a minor child, or left a dependent father or mother. We are at sea about it; and if the gentleman from Illinois has been so anxious to pension these parties why did he not introduce a bill for that purpose and have it referred to the committee for investigation, to see whether or not the cases were such that pensions ought to be granted?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman let me say a word?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Answer my question, and do not answer it by asking another.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now let me answer my friend. Does he not know——

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Answer the question, but not by asking me a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I shall answer in my own way, or not at all.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then, of course, I can not yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well. After the gentleman has concluded his remarks I would like to say a word with reference to this matter.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Go on. I will hear the gentleman's question now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I merely wished to state that if my amendment had been considered and adopted, and had it turned out that there were no widows, no dependent mothers, or no orphan children, no harm would have been done; while on the contrary if there had been, they would have become entitled to the privileges extended to the beneficiary of this bill. But in point of fact we all know that there are survivors. We know, for ihstance, that the widow of Lieutenant Collins is living. Her name is not mentioned. Several others are not mentioned who are living. By that amendment there would be no unfair discrimination.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. This is the first time that I have been informed of that fact. The committee had no such information. I did know that there was the widow of Captain De Long living, because a bill was introduced and referred to the committee to grant her a pension, and we found that fact and reported it back to the House. But this is the first time that I have learned there was another widow in all of that crew.

But we are not even now told her condition. We do not know whether she is dependent or not. We do not know whether it may not be a fact that she is rich and all that. If the gentleman will introduce a bill for the relief of that widow or any of these persons and have it referred to the Committee on Pensions, the committee will at once take action upon the matter and report a bill for the relief of any who may be in need of and entitled to pensions. But no bill has been reported or introduced for any other person, and the gentleman ought not to put such an amendment on this bill until the committee have examined and reported upon the facts.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The only amendment I have offered, the gentleman will remember, has been ruled out on the point of order; but I was simply using the fact as an illustration of the argument that dependent mothers or the other widows ought to be pensioned, and that no discrimination should be made. If there is no dependent mother there would be no pension of course.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Now, as to the case of Lieutenant Chipp we have no evidence of the fact that his father was dependent upon him at all; and if he was not dependent upon him then he would not be entitled to a pension any more than the father of a soldier who was killed in battle if the father was not dependent upon the son for his support.

In the case of Dr. Ambler there is no evidence that the mother is a widow even. There is no evidence but that the father is still living; and if he was not dependent, under the pension laws he would not be entitled to a pension even though the son had been a soldier and he had been killed in battle.

Mr. BAGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offered my amendment because the Chair ruled the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina to be in order.

I wish to say in relation to the dependence of Warren Chipp, the father of Lieutenant Chipp, that he was dependent upon his son. But I have grave doubts about attaching this amendment to the original bill, and if in order I would like to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can withdraw it.

Mr. BAGLEY. Then I will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to lay the bill as amended aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside——

Mr. BENNETT. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken. The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 4.

Mr. BENNETT. No quorum.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BAGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with various recommendations.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 28, 1884.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, called the Senate to order, and the Secretary read the following letter:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Anna Ginn, of Kirkville, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act granting to her a pension on account of the death of her husband from disease contracted in the military service during the war of the rebellion, reported a bill (S. 2350) granting a pension to Anna Ginn; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6085) granting a pension to John A. Hassell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill. I move that it be printed and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

A bill (H. R. 6184) granting a pension to Julia M. Reynolds.

TONAWANDA ISLAND BRIDGE.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably the bill (H. R. 6761) respecting a bridge at Tonawanda, in the State of New York, and to ask for its consideration at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to declare a lawful structure any bridge erected in pursuance of chapter 279 of the laws of the State of New York of the year 1883, entitled "An act to incorporate the Tonawanda Island Bridge Company for the purpose of constructing and operating a bridge from Tonawanda Island to North Tonawanda;" but the bridge shall not be built or commenced until the plan and location have been submitted to the Secretary of War and by him approved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the bill (S. 2185) respecting a bridge at Tonawanda, in the State of New York, be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM REINHARDT.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to report back favorably the bill (H. R. 585) granting a pension to William Reinhardt. In this connection I wish to state that the same bill was passed as a Senate bill some days since, but in order to make the passage of the bill more certain I report the House bill. The report in the case has already been printed, and therefore it will not be necessary to reprint the report. When the bill is reached on the Calendar, it may be necessary to move to recall the Senate bill from the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest that the bill be acted upon at this time and passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of William Reinhardt, late a private in Company K, First Regiment Kansas Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In order that the record may be perfect, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 315) granting a pension to William Reinhardt was passed and to request the House of Representatives to return the bill to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the order that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the vote be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will stand until the bill is received from the other House.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. KENNA introduced a bill (S. 2351) to authorize the construction of a railroad through the United States Government property on the north side of the Great Kanawha River, in West Virginia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KENNA. I introduce this bill by request. I wish to state that I have not examined the bill, and I do not commit myself to its provisions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. KENNA. No; the property through which the railroad is proposed to be built is property owned by the United States in connection with the sites for locks and dams. For that reason I should like to have the bill referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be so referred.

STREETS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. PENDLETON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire whether any additional legislation is necessary to enable the commissioners of the District to keep clean the streets in the city of Washington.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives; which was read:

IN THE HOUSE, June 27, 1884.

Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 6861, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 11, 12, 36, and 38.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, 48, 49, and 50, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment, insert "$12,150,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "That the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint on the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General as many post quartermaster-sergeants, not to exceed eighty, as he may deem necessary for the interests of the service, said sergeants to be selected by examination from the most competent enlisted men of the Army, who have served at least four years and whose character and education shall fit them to take charge of public property and to act as clerks and assistants to post and other quartermasters. Said post quartermaster-sergeants shall so far as practicable perform the duties of storekeepers and clerks in lieu of citizen employés. The post quartermaster-sergeants shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall receive for their services the same pay and allowances as ordnance sergeants;" and the Sanate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 10, after the word "advertisement," in lines 8 and 9 of the bill, insert the following: "except in cases of extreme emergency;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

At the end of the amended paragraph, after the word "Register," insert the following:

"Provided, That the medical officers of the Army and contract surgeons shall, whenever practicable, attend the families of the officers and soldiers free of charge."

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendment numbered 35 the conference committee is unable to agree,

JNO. A. LOGAN,
P. B. PLUMB,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
WILLIAM H. FORNEY,
RICH'D W. TOWNSHEND,
J. WARREN KEIFER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state in regard to the report that the only point of difference left between the two Houses is in regard to the item inserted by the House, which was equivalent to the item in the Post-Office appropriation bill providing that the compensation to be paid to the Pacific railroads should be one-half that paid to other railroads for similar services. Following the action of the Senate in that particular in regard to the Post-Office appropriation bill, and the action of the Senate also in striking out the provision of the House, the conferees refused to concur in the proposition of the House to restore that paragraph. Everything else is agreed upon.

The only serious differences that existed were in regard to some matters of administration in the Army, the question of fuel, from which the House receded, the question of the amount of money to be appropriated for commissary supplies, the amount of difference being divided between the two Houses, and the proposition in regard to the Pay Department. The House reduced the number of officers of the Pay Department to twenty-nine, the Senate increased the number to thirty-five, and the House conferees agreed to it. The only remaining point of difference, as I said, is that in regard to railroad transportation. I wish to say, so that I may not be misunderstood, that the Senate did not increase the number of officers of the Pay Department now in the Army. The number is now forty-five, and by operation of existing law it is reduced as vacancies occur to forty. The bill if it shall become a law will make a further reduction of the number to thirty-five.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate further insist on its thirty-fifth amendment, disagreed to by the House, and accede to the request of the House for a further conference thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. LOGAN, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. RANSOM were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 42) for the relief of Joseph F. Wilson; and

A bill (S. 534) for the relief of J. T. Pickett.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 78) to provide for the retirement of Col. Henry J. Hunt as a major-general of the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. 807) for the relief of Mary A. Lee;

A bill (H. R. 1073) granting a pension to William J. Lee; and

A bill (H. R. 1299) for the relief of Alonzo Gesner.

BESSIE S. GILMORE.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7235, being the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow me to call up Senate bill 2321, which will excite no discussion, reported from the Committee on Finance, for the relief of Mrs. Bessie Gilmore. It is a small bill, but a matter of some importance to her. If it excites any debate at all, I shall not ask the Senator to give way further.

Mr. HALE. I will yield, saying this: It is very desirable that the deficiency appropriation bill should be got through not only to-day but as early as possible in the day, so that it may be sent to the other House that the House may act upon it and we may have the conferees appointed in order that work may be done on closing it. I will yield on condition that the bill of the Senator from Ohio gives rise to no debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Ohio, being the bill (S. 2321) for the relief of Bessie S. Gilmore?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to redeem United States 5 per cent. coupon bond numbered 38712, for $1,000, act of July 14, 1870, with interest thereon from the 1st day of August, 1876, to the 12th day of August, 1881; also one United States 5 per cent. coupon bond numbered 54191, for $500, act of July 14, 1870, with interest thereon from the 1st day of August, 1876, to the 21st day of May, 1881; also one United States 5 per cent. 10-40 coupon bond numbered 28253, for $500, act of March 3, 1864, with interest thereon from September 1, 1876, to July 18, 1879, in favor of Bessie S. Gilmore, who claims to have been the owner thereof on September 14, 1876, at which time it is alleged they were stolen from her, and who further claims that they were afterward destroyed by the thief or thieves, upon the said Bessie S. Gilmore furnishing to the Treasury Department a bond of indemnity, with good and sufficient sureties, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to secure the United States against loss or damage in consequence of the redemption of said bonds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I thought the Secretary of the Treasury had ample authority by statute now to redeem lost and destroyed bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. This does not fall within his power. There is a letter from the Secretary or the Comptroller of the Treasury stating that it does not fall within the description and class of bonds that he can relieve, and he recommends it to Congress and advises the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. The report of the committee is very brief.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. SHERMAN June 24, 1884:

The Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 2321) for the relief of Bessie S. Gilmore, respectfully reports:

That it is clearly shown by the papers on file that Mrs. Bessie S. Gilmore was the owner of the bonds described in the bill, amounting to $2,000; that they were in her possession on board the Bremen steamer Neckar, in September, 1876; that while on the voyage they were either lost or stolen and have never been recovered; that active efforts were made by the officers of the boat, by the police officers on the arrival of the steamer at Bremen, and by the German authorities to recover the bonds, without success; and that all the circumstances indicate that the bonds were destroyed to avoid detection. They were called in due course by the Treasury Department prior to July 1, 1881, but neither bonds nor coupons have been presented. Mrs. Gilmore applied to the Treasury Department for relief under existing law on or about June, 1880, and established to the satisfaction of the Comptroller her ownership of the bonds and their loss. The Comptroller adds:

"It does not sufficiently appear that these bonds, or any of them, are destroyed. Under the provisions of the Revised Statutes, sections 3702, 3703, and 3704, no relief, in the present condition of the case, can be granted to Mrs. Gilmore. Whenever the bonds have been outstanding a sufficient length of time it is probable that she may obtain relief from Congress."

More than four years having elapsed since the date of the Comptroller's report, and it appearing that neither bonds nor coupons have been presented for payment, and it being clearly established that the claimant has a right to the bonds and the proceeds, your committee is of the opinion that she is entitled to relief by the payment of the amount of the bonds and the coupons maturing to the date of the call, upon her furnishing to the Treasury Department a bond of indemnity in the usual form.

Your committee therefore recommends the passage of the bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute more accurately describing the bonds.

Mr. COCKRELL. This question has been before the Senate repeatedly. While the distinguished Senator who asked for the present consideration of this bill was Secretary of the Treasury his subordinate officers reported very strongly against the very thing that he is now recommending. Under the general law the bond must be proved to have been actually destroyed. The records of the Treasury Department show proof just as conclusive as that produced here of the loss of bonds, and the bonds have suddenly turned up. The proof in those cases was not correct, and there is no proof here that is conclusive. If the owner of these bonds had proved the loss and destruction of the bonds the Treasury Department would have paid them. They have power to do that now. The owner has not proved the actual destruction of them. The bill upon its face shows the proof was that the bonds were stolen and they have not been heard of since.

Mr. SHERMAN. Eight years ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. A bond of indemnity will be given in this case to repay the amount if the bond is hereafter presented. In the lapse of twenty or thirty years the bond is presented at the Treasury; it has to be paid. Where will be the securities of this applicant?

There are millions of dollars involved in this proposition, as is shown by the records of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to unclaimed, uncalled for, and unredeemed bonds. Now, if you open the door in this way you open a door to fraud. Some man will get the numbers of these bonds which have not been presented for redemption, and he and his confederates will make positive proof of the ownership of the bonds at a certain time, and that they have been stolen, and they will come in here and secure the payment of the whole of them.

Mr. HALE. As this has given rise to debate, I must object.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I am done. I simply wanted to enter my earnest protest against such legislation as vicious and dangerous.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not stand in the way of the appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I will yield for a vote but not for further debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that the Comptroller recommends the passage of this bill because the proof is conclusive, except as to the actual destruction of the bonds which under the law is necessary. I hope the Senator from Missouri will allow the bill to pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not making objection except to put myself on the record against this kind of legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Finance. The amendment will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not necessary to read the amendment again. It has been read once. It simply corrects the dates and description of the bonds. They were not sufficiently described and the Treasury Department sent in the draught of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPOKANE FALLS AND CŒUR D'ALENE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Maine has kindly consented to yield to me for a moment to bring to the attention of the Senate a bill which I ask to take up.

Mr. HALE. It is upon the condition that it gives rise to no debate whatever; but after that I must go on with the deficiency bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to say a word. I think there was a misunderstanding in the Senate when I moved to take this bill up before. It was supposed I was antagonizing the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], who desired to proceed with private pension bills, and some Senators thought this was a right-of-way bill. This is a bill simply to incorporate a company to build a railroad in Idaho Territory. The general statutes prevent the incorporation of a company in the Territory by a private charter; there is no general law there authorizing such a corporation; and unless Congress grant this charter the building of this railroad will be delayed until after the next session of the Idaho Territorial Legislature. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of the bill (S. 1642) to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company. If any Senator thinks there is an objection to the bill I ask him to wait until the report is read, which is very short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 1642 be considered at this time. The Chair hears no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not desire to retard the passage of any bill to organize a railroad company in that section of the country; but there seems to be a good deal in this bill and I ask that it be laid over to be examined. There is a provision about consolidation, and I think it gives the right which has been claimed by the Northern Pacific to go into all that section of country and take timber to build their railroad. Therefore without desiring to impede the passage of the bill, I object.

Mr. HALE. As it gives rise to debate I must object to its further consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Maine would allow me to call up a bill that will pass without debate. It is only three or four lines, and has once passed the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to say a word. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company has nothing whatever to do with this bill. It was before the Committee on Railroads and it does nothing but incorporate a company. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw his objection and let the bill pass. It was carefully considered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will examine it to-day. As I understand the bill, it gives the privileges granted by the general law where railroads are organized. I can see no reason why this company should be given from the public domain all the timber it may desire for ties and otherwise.

Mr. DOLPH. It simply says they shall have the right of way under the general law.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If they merely want to organize a company, that is one thing; but when they organize as a railroad company and you give them privileges of consolidation and otherwise and take all the timber they want, is a different matter.

Mr. HALE. I object to debate.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEW BEDFORD.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow a bill to be read for information which is only three or four lines in length. It is Order of Business 829, a bill which once passed the Senate, and ought to have passed the other day with bills of the same kind.

Mr. HALE. If it will not give rise to a word of debate, I shall not object.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 2246.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2246) to provide for the purchase of additional land for the uses of the public building in the city of New Bedford, State of Massachusetts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to give notice that at the close of the deficiency bill, which is about to be taken up, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill known as the river and harbor bill and proceed with it to-day as far as we can.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yesterday the Senate asked the House of Representatives for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 25) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, and the conferees on the part of the Senate were orderd to be appointed by the Presiding Officer. The Chair will appoint as the conferees on the part of the Senate the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the first or formal reading be dispensed with, and that the bill be considered by paragraphs, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be considered by paragraphs for the consideration of the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of State," after line 14 of section 1, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to pay the expenses of the removal of the remains of Francis P. Van Wyck, late United States consul at Turk's Island, to the United States, and the expenses of burial, $934.84.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 19 of section 1, to insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to unite with the Government of His Majesty the King of Spain in tendering to the distinguished gentlemen who have successively filled the post of umpire in the late Spanish and American Claims Commission suitable testimonials to express the high appreciation with which the two governments regard the service they have rendered in the adjustment of an important international question by the amicable resort of arbitration; and that to do so, in compliance with the terms of the protocol of June 2, 1883, between the two governments, there is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $9,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "foreign intercourse," in section 1, line 56, after the word "cent," to strike out—

And hereafter it shall not be lawful for any consular officer to expend from the amount received from the fees of his office any sum in excess of the allowance of salary and fees directly authorized by law, except such consular officers as are paid exclusively by fees and the consuls paid in part by salary and in part by fees, and in the latter case only such portion of the fees as are authorized in excess of their salaries.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 88, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seven thousand five hundred" and insert "ten thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For the payment of the remaining expenses connected with the service of the International Fishery Exhibition held at London in 1883, and for the preparation of the report called for by act approved July 18, 1882, to be expended by the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, under the direction and regulations of the Department of State, $10,000, the same to be available until June 30, 1885.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884.

The message further announced that the House had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 828) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM S. ROSECRANS of California, Mr. CHARLES H. MORGAN of Missouri, and Mr. BYRON M. CUTCHEON of Michigan managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Resolved, That the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, be amended by inserting the figure "9" after the figure "7" in the following paragraph:

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered, respectively, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and agree to the same," making the said paragraph read as follows:

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered, respectively, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9, and agree to the same."

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Maine one moment to take up the resolution just received from the House to correct a mere clerical error in the report of the committee of conference on the bill granting a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railroad Company.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will not ask to do that now. It is very important, as I said before, that the deficiency bill should get before the House at an early hour to-day.

Mr. BROWN. It is simply to correct a clerical error. All I ask is that it be read and acted on. I will not make any remarks at all.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the House resolution?

Mr. HALE. If it give rise to any debate, I shall object.

Mr. BROWN. If there is any question or debate about it, I shall not urge it now. There was a mere clerical omission to insert that the House recede from its disagreement to our amendment numbered 9. The clerk omitted in copying the report to put that in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, be amended by inserting the figure "9" after the figure "7" in the following paragraph, namely:

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered, respectively, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and agree to the same," making the said paragraph read as follows, namely:

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered, respectively, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9, and agree to the same."

Mr. BROWN. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. The subject to which this paragraph relates was considered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, by whom I was directed to introduce an amendment to be proposed to the bill making appropriations for the Post-Office Department and for reference to the Committee on Appropriations. In accordance with that action of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I introduced that amendment, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but as I understand was considered by them as more appropriate in connection with the deficiency bill. Therefore I reintroduced the amendment and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations, in order that it might be considered in connection with this bill.

The result of the paragraph now under consideration does not make an appropriation sufficient to meet the adjustment of these salaries under the laws referred to, and therefore I desire to offer as a substitute for the paragraph the amendment introduced by me as I have related, which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In place of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations it is proposed to substitute:

That in all cases of salaries of postmasters and late postmasters which shall be readjusted under the act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Postmaster-General to readjust the salaries of certain postmasters in accordance with the provision of section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866," the amounts due, when ascertained and audited, shall be paid as said act directs; and such payments shall be made out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the Senator from Iowa, on my explanation of the action of the Committee on Appropriations, will insist upon his amendment. The bill that we are considering provides for deficiencies for the present year and the past year. The committee took the decisions that had been made in these old post-office claims, sent to the Department, and got a report of all claims that had been audited and that by law were entitled to payment, and has put these claims in here requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to send any others that might be audited before the bill goes through, and I have an amendment that will add to the amount reported here enough to cover all that have been reported; but I do not think the Senator would wish that these claims, which come up unexpectedly under the construction of a law not deemed probable at the time when it was passed, should have preference over other claims. Just as fast as they are audited and comptrolled they should be submitted to Congress and should be subject to the scrutiny of Congress by an appropriation bill, and that is the rule the Committee on Appropriations applies to other matters.

There are various other matters of an extensive kind that are being all the time considered by the Departments, and as fast as they report them we appropriate for them; but the committee did not think that upon this appropriation bill this class of claims should be preferred to others and any provision should be made for their payment in the future, but that as fast as they are audited they should be sent to Congress and subjected to scrutiny. There have been old cases of claims that have come before Congress where an investigation has shown mistakes in the Departments enough to put us upon our caution; and these claims the committee believe should be subjected to just the same rule, and we mean to report all as fast as they are audited.

I do not think the Senator on this explanation would wish that these claims should be preferred to others.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will delay for a moment. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I ask that that be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks that the unfinished business be informally laid aside for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the appropriation bill is continued before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. I am not asking the Senate to adopt an amendment that will give a preference to these claims over any other proper claims. I am asking that an appropriation be made for the payment of claims adjusted, in accordance with an act of Congress, in the order of their adjustment. Something of a controversy occurred between Congress and the Post-Office Department concerning the proper construction of the act to which this amendment relates. The Postmaster-General sought the advice of the Attorney-General. He received it. Upon that he has formulated the rules under which he is proceeding to the adjustment of these claims. The claims of postmasters in several of the States have already been determined, and the others will be adjusted as rapidly as the force of the Department can perform the work. They all rest upon the same basis, are all governed by the same rules, and it was for that reason that we asked a general appropriation in the Post-Office bill. That was denied by the Committee on Appropriations. A partial appropriation is provided for here. We ask that it may be extended to that amount which will in due course and under the rules of the Department when each of these claims shall be adjusted provide for their payment in their order.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator why we should in this bill provide for anything more than have become deficiencies by being audited and allowed, for they never are deficiencies until they are audited and allowed?

Mr. WILSON. The reason for that is that the Committee on Appropriations declined to make provision for the payment in the regular appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HALE. I do not see how they could make the appropriation in that bill because it is an uncertain matter; all of these things are uncertain. Why it is that this particular class of claims should be preferred over other classes, and why an appropriation should be made beforehand so that they shall not be subject to the scrutiny of Congress as fast as they are to be paid, I can not, for one, see. We appropriate to pay them just as fast as they become deficiencies, just as fast as they are reported, audited, and allowed. Why, for instance, should this class of claims be preferred to a class of claims found on page 72?

For commutation of rations to prisoners of war in rebel States, prior to July 1, 1881, $16,864.58.

Or on page 73:

For horses and other property lost in the military service, prior to July 1, 1881.

All those questions have been settled by decisions that the claimants are allowed and entitled to their money, but we do not anticipate and appropriate beforehand, and leave the entire discretion for payment; we require the Department to certify, audit, and report these claims to Congress, and then Congress exercises its discretion and pays them just as fast as they are certified and allowed. Again, I say I can not see why this class of claims should be preferred over war claims that have been allowed, and are continually being allowed.

Mr. WILSON. This whole subject was considered by Congress. An act was passed directing the adjustment and payment to be made. A controversy occurred in the Department as to the meaning of that act. The Attorney-General's opinion, as I have already said, was sought in order to determine that controversy. It was had. The adjustment is proceeding in accordance therewith for not what are ordinary claims, but for amounts that are found, and to be found, to be due, in pursuance of an act of Congress. It is no more a claim against the Government, in the proper sense of that term, than the payment of any other amounts in the future that are provided for by the appropriation bills for the current or the next fiscal year. It is simply a question as to whether the adjustments of these claims, so called, when determined in pursuance of law, shall be paid or the claimants shall wait for another year and for the enactment of another deficiency bill.

Mr. HALE. It is no more than what we do in all cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. If the amendment to the amendment is voted down, I have an amendment increasing the amount so as to cover all claims that are audited to the present time.

Mr. MORGAN. The manner in which this land has been handled by the Post-Office Department admonishes us that we are not to expect anything at all from the Post-Office Department that is not dragooned through. There has been an evident purpose to prevent the execution of the statute which has stood upon the statute-book for several years. It commenced with a law regulating the adjustment of salaries of postmasters for antecedent services, growing out of the fact that we changed the method of compensation from a commission on the sales of postage-stamps to a fixed amount graded and regulated under the discretion somewhat of the Postmaster-General.

The law was suspended in its action for two years, buffeted about back and forth between the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General, and finally during the early part of this session, by force of resolutions passed through this body, we got those officers to act upon the subject. Thereupon an adjustment of these postmasters' accounts commenced, which has been a very slow process. They have gone through with the accounts of the State of Alabama and made their report upon them, a report which I do not think is sanctioned by the law. At the same time I suppose it is conclusive upon the people of that State; and there is money enough in the bill to pay all the postmasters in Alabama, so that I have not any of what you might call State or personal interest in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. My State is provided for, because they took up the States in alphabetical order and so considered them, and I believe they have considered two or three other States, I do not know exactly how many.

An appropriation was made of $250,000—that is my remembrance of the sum of money—in that act for the purpose of paying these accounts as they were adjusted. Delays have occurred until that appropriation has been allowed to lapse into the Treasury. The object of the Senator's amendment, or at least the effect of it, I suppose, would be to reinstate that appropriation and to allow it to stand exactly where Congress put it when the act was passed, so that as fast as the Post-Office Department should ascertain what the claims are there would be a fund on hand to pay them. As I stated, that fund has been allowed to lapse into the Treasury.

Is there any justice in the payment of the claims of the postmasters in Alabama at this time and in postponing for one year the payment of the claims of postmasters, for instance, in the State of Maryland? They all claim under the same law. It is a mere matter of convenience to that Department how many cases they will decide in a given time. They postpone and postpone the making of decisions to suit the pleasure of the subordinates in that Department, who, I regret to say, have the control of the office. When they shall have adjusted the claims hereafter that stand precisely on the same footing with the claims from Alabama, and these men come, after waiting nearly twenty years for their money, and ask for it, they will say, "We can not pay you until a deficiency bill is passed."

The Senator from Maine intimates that it is necessary that the Appropriations Committee should have these claims passed under its revision before any money is appropriated to pay them, after they have been allowed in the Post-Office Department. I would respectfully suggest that if there is any revision of these matters to take place, and I hope a revision may take place, it ought to be done by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. They have looked at this question. They have come before the Senate session after session with their urgent demands that this debt of the Government, recognized by an act of Congress, should be paid.

There can not be any doubt about the debt being due, because Congress has enacted that it is due. There can not be any doubt about the sum of money due to each postmaster, because it depends simply upon a computation made up on the records of the Department. It does not depend upon proof aliunde, or any extraneous fact that is not found displayed upon the records of the Post-Office Department. It is a simple matter of calculation and computation, and nothing else. The debt is due; it has been heretofore provided for by law. There is nothing to be done but to calculate the sum of it and to pay it.

There is no necessity for the amounts to pass under the revision of the Committee on Appropriations, and if there were the Senate of the United States would find itself in the presence of a necessity imposed by law upon one of its committees that the committee can not discharge and never pretends to discharge, for the Committee on Appropriations does not overhaul these accounts to see whether the computations have been correctly made or not. They can not do it; they have not the time to do it, and they do not do it. So there is no occasion now for keeping this money out of the hands of these postmasters in order that a mere matter of routine may be performed of passing the account after it becomes a deficiency through the hands of the Committee on Appropriations.

This is not in the proper sense a deficiency. It is the mere failure of the Government to pay a debt that was due and acknowledged to be due by an act of Congress on account of the shortness of an appropriation given for a specific purpose by law, and also because the appropriation has lapsed into the Treasury, the officers of the Post-Office Department not having applied it as they were required to do by law. That is the whole of it.

This item ought to have gone upon the general Post-Office appropriation bill, but the Senator from Iowa informs us that notwithstanding the Committee on Appropriations passed a resolution asking that the Senator would introduce the amendment and send it to the Committee on Appropriations, they made the point that it had better go upon the deficiency bill, and now that we get upon the deficiency bill they make the point that it ought to have gone upon the general Post-Office appropriation bill.

I do not know where this is to end, or when these men are ever to get their money. There are thousands of them in the United States who for a great number of years have been kept out of the debt that Congress has acknowledged to be due to them and has provided the means of ascertaining and paying, but we can not get the debt paid. The matter has gone to such an extent that I am filled with apprehensions and suspicious that there is somebody in the Post-Office Department who intends to keep these postmasters out of their dues. I can not repress that conviction.

I hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, because it seems to be the only way left open now by which these men can get what is due them under the law.

Mr. HALE. Let me state briefly what the Committee on Appropriations is trying to do here. If it does not commend itself to the good sense and judgment of the Senate, then it ought not to stand. Years ago authority was given to several Departments upon claims arising under statutes and decisions to not only audit and pass but to pay the claims. There was no brake upon it; there was no limit; there was no power beyond the Department. So many inaccuracies, abuses, and troubles arose under that act that in 1878 Congress, for the purpose of curing these payments under general appropriations, without the discretion and supervision of Congress being exercised, passed the following law:

It shall be the duty of the several accounting officers—

And I ask Senators to listen to this act—

It shall be the duty of the several accounting officers of the Treasury to continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of all claims under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund, under the provisions of said section, that may be brought before them within a period of five years; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall report the amount due to each claimant at the commencement of each session to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration.

That act has cured a thousand abuses that formerly existed in the Departments having the power to audit and report and pay, for it was found that mistake after mistake occurred, and the conservative action of passing this statute was adopted. The Committee on Appropriations now is seeking to put this class of claims under the law as all other claims are, as the claims to which I have called attention, the claims for commutation to prisoners in the war, the claims for horses stolen, the claims of the States for different allowances, the thousand claims that are coming up. We wait until they are audited and reported to us. What reason there is why this special class of claims should be taken out of the operation of the act of 1878, as I have said, I fail to see.

Mr. MORGAN. They never were put under the operation of that act.

Mr. HALE. No; but they come under the spirit of the statute exactly. That act was passed undoubtedly before these claims arose, but this is the same class of claims precisely. The Senator claims that it comes from an appropriation that lapsed.

Mr. MORGAN. These are claims specially appropriated for.

Mr. HALE. So the statute of 1878 says:

Under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund.

This is an appropriation that has been carried to the surplus fund. It has lapsed.

Mr. MORGAN. It has not been carried strictly to the surplus fund, but it has lapsed simply because the officers of the Government did not perform a duty which was enjoined upon them by the law to ascertain the amount due.

Mr. HALE. Precisely as were the cases that gave rise to the statute of 1878. There had been appropriation made, bills had accumulated, thousands upon thousands of them, and the money had not been paid, and had lapsed and gone into the Treasury. Congress then decided after careful examination—and that is a cardinal act which has been the guide of the Departments ever since—and the Committee on Appropriations have striven always to hold the payment for such claims down to the act of 1878. A large portion of the claims that are in this appropriation are under that very act, and we wait until the Department reports them to us, instead of giving the fund beforehand.

On another point, let me answer if I can the Senator from Alabama as to delay. If there is anybody in the Post-Office Department who is delaying these claims or is hostile to them, that will not be reached by general appropriation. I have heard no complaint that the auditing and comptrolling officers of the Treasury do not take these reports just as fast as they come to them and hurry them up and send them into Congress. If there is hostility in the Post-Office Department, that will not in any degree be removed by general legislation.

I have stated what the Committee on Appropriations is trying to do. If the Senate thinks it is fit and proper to give this general appropriation, to take away the scrutiny that Congress has over these claims, as it has over all others, and make them a favored class, I have nothing to say and the committee has nothing to say; but I felt it my duty to the Senate and to the committee that I should state the attitude of the committee and what it is trying to do, and the Senate must settle it.

Mr. WILSON. The claims referred to generally by the Senator from Maine are of a class different from those which we are now considering. These claims, so called, are to be determined by the records of the Post-Office Department, and no other evidence whatever is to be considered in their adjustment. Therefore they do not come within the spirit of the act to which the Senator has referred.

As to the scrutiny which Congress is to exercise concerning these claims, I will ask the Senator from Maine whether in making an appropriation to pay the expenses of the Post-Office Department they look into and examine all of the readjustments of postmasters' salaries under the biennial adjustment of the Department? If not, why apply it to this class of claims, for they rest upon precisely the rule which the Department follows in readjusting the salaries of postmasters biennially.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator to allow me to make a suggestion. On page 75 of the bill is a provision "for refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers for which reimbursement is provided by act of July 27, 1861, and subsequent acts." There is a class of claims that is recognized by law and required to be paid. Yet it has never been asked that we should appropriate beforehand to pay these claims to the States, but just as fast as under the act they are submitted to the Treasury, certified, allowed, and reported to Congress, then we examine them and report upon them and pay them. This class of claims of postmasters is under a special act with a construction that has been fixed, and they have their claims under that act just exactly as the States have, and they ought to be submitted to the same scrutiny and to the same rules as all other claims. So it seems to me.

Mr. WILSON. The evidence upon which the claims of the States are based is of a character entirely different from that which applies to those we are now considering. With regard to the claims of States the evidence is made up not by the General Government and its officers and determined by its records, but by the officers and records of the States. Therefore it is quite proper that there should be a difference in the rule between the two cases.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator the least idea of what these amounts will be until they are reported to us? Why should we go ahead into this unexplored domain of uncertainty? Nobody knows what they will be. I do not know whether they will be $100,000 or $500,000, or a million and a half, nor does he. It is an uncertain field. Just as fast as they are perfected, pay them. That is what we do with others.

Mr. WILSON. That answers the Senator's argument with regard to the necessity of the scrutiny to be bestowed upon them by the Committee on Appropriations. As fast as they are settled, pay. Therefore, why not make provision in order that they may be paid, because they are all settled alike and upon the same rules and the same character of evidence, and that is made up by the Government itself.

Mr. HALE. The committee, and any committee that has charge of the funds, of the purse of the Government, ought to have the right, as the Committee on Appropriations does, to send to the Departments and ask them on what basis such a claim is allowed. The comptrolling officers of the Treasury Department during the consideration of these appropriation bills day by day visit the room of the committee and bring their papers in. It not infrequently happens that a mistake is found. The other day the committee happened on one that had been reported. Some question was raised. The Comptroller was sent for. He came with his deputy and brought the papers up, and the committee found that a mistake had been made. The officers were wrong, and they asked the committee to strike it out, as we did. That is the scrutiny that ought finally to be passed upon, particularly in a matter of this kind, where it is a forced construction, where it is a pure claim. But as I have said, the Senate must take its course naturally about this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations?

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 12, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Maine will not make a point about the lack of a quorum. Let the amendment go into the bill and we can consider it again in the Senate. When the bill gets there the Senate will probably be fuller.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator is bent upon opening this door, I think the majority of the Senate ought to vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum is present.

Mr. MORGAN. This will lead to a great deal of explanation and debate, I think, if the Senator insists upon a vote.

Mr. HALE. I do not. It is nothing for me to insist upon. There is no quorum here and no majority of the Senate has voted for the provision. If there had, I should make no point. Only twelve Senators voted for the amendment. It is not I that am insisting.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator insists upon pushing his amendment now, of course I can not help that.

Mr. WILSON. I have no desire to delay progress on the bill, and with the understanding that the amendment will be renewed when the bill is reported to the Senate, I will withdraw it.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection, of course, to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the amount fixed in the amendment of the committee, "$35,950.49," be changed to "$45,213.80."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1032 of section 1, at the end of the clause providing for payment of district attorneys and their assistants, fees of clerks, commissioners, &c., to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the money contained in this and the preceding paragraph shall be used to pay special counsel fees.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill why the committee propose to amend by striking out the paragraph just read? I supposed the last statute upon the subject of special counsel provided that special counsel should not be paid except where there was some law authorizing their employment.

Mr. HALE. What is the question of the Senator?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I see the House provision is to be stricken out, which reads:

Provided, That no part of the money contained in this and the preceding paragraph shall be used to pay special counsel fees.

It was supposed that a great abuse had sprung up. In the first place, years ago a great abuse did spring up in the employment of special counsel, and a law was passed then that there should be no payment to special counsel except when some act of Congress authorized their employment. Notwithstanding that provision of the statute, the Attorney-General exercised a discretion which he had probably no right to do, in the employment to an unlimited extent and also in giving compensation apparently to an unlimited amount, and in order to check that the House I suppose inserted this provision that no part of this deficiency should be allowed in the payment of special counsel.

Mr. HALE. The committee did not think that the Attorney-General had violated the law. At any rate these are old things in the past where the contract had been made and the service had been rendered. Whatever may be the result of the attention that has been called to the matter and the feeling that has been evoked in Congress and elsewhere upon the Departments in the future, the committee thought it better to make no limitation as to the past. These old bills have got to be paid, and we did not deem it proper to put in any prohibition but preferred to leave the law as it is.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If what the special star-route counsel have been testifying under oath before a committee of the other House be true, or if any reasonable portion of it be true, it is perfectly evident that there should be no more money paid in that direction. Thousands upon thousands of dollars have been paid to the special star-route counsel. Enormous and fabulous amounts, in some cases $25,000 and $30,000 per year, have been paid with no results. There has been an enormous expenditure of money in the trial of those causes, and yet the very counsel come before a committee of the other House and give such testimony as to show that they not only did not earn the money, if there was a contract made, but that they violated their faith to their client, and really while they were receiving this compensation from the Government were in the act of betraying their client, the Government of the United States.

Mr. HALE. This does not relate to the star-route cases at all. I will tell the Senator what it does cover. It is the expenses of the trial of Guiteau. The Senator remembers how long, how laborious, how annoying, how exasperating that trial was, and not only the responsible nature but the exceedingly disagreeable character of the work of the counsel for the Government, in which they continued all through the winter and into the spring, I think. The fees were not considered by the committee as being at all unreasonable. I do not think the Senator himself would so consider them. They did not amount to anything like the star-route cases, and this does not cover any of those.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It does not cover any of the star-route cases?

Mr. HALE. No; it covers this other matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, to strike out lines 1035 to 1038, inclusive, of section 1, as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer an amendment to come in after line 358 of section 1:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the amount paid for expenses of the commission appointed to go to Louisiana April, 1877, $3,950.73.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to lines 505 to 515, inclusive, of section 1, on page 22 of the bill. I was not in at the time that item was acted on, and I ask that it may be reconsidered now. I ask that those lines be read. The item is one making appropriation for the rent of Fort Brown and the Fort Brown reservation.

The facts in regard to the case I will state in a very few words. Fort Brown was established in 1846, during the Mexican war; it is opposite to Matamoras, in Mexico; and from that time on continuously, with the exception of the four years of the civil war, it has been occupied by the United States Government as a fort. It is the most important fort on the Rio Grande. Upon it the United States has expended perhaps half a million dollars. The fort is a necessity for the defense of that frontier.

The title of that property had been in dispute until very recently, through a long period of years. First it will be found in the Supreme Court reports in the case of Trevino vs. Cavazos, a very important case, involving the title to a very large grant of land. Next in Brownsville vs. Cavazos, in 100 United States Reports. There for the first time the question was definitely settled in that case as to the ownership of the property. There are 350 acres in the reservation. The United States never did own it. It is an important fort. The United States was always willing to pay rent to whomsoever might be entitled to it, but it was a question to whom it should go, and hence as that question was wholly unsettled the matter was left in abeyance till the settlement of the title to the property. The United States have put improvements on property belonging to private parties never claimed to belong to the United States, but they could not settle to whom to pay the rent until the title was decided. The title was settled in the case to which I have referred, and I will ask the Secretary to read this letter from the Secretary of War, which will show precisely what I have stated in regard to it, and show that this is recognized as a just claim by the War Department and by the Quartermaster-General. I ask that the letter be placed on record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin). The Committee of the Whole agreed to the amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will recognize the fact that I was casually absent when the item was acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas can move a reconsideration.

Mr. MAXEY. I will move, then, to reconsider the vote agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I told the Senator there was no necessity for that, as I would make no question about it.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator said it would be considered as not agreed to. Now, I ask that the letter be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, May 3, 1884.

SIR: Acknowledging the receipt of the telegram of yesterday's date requesting that the information called for by letter from the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, of the 22d ultimo, in relation to H. R. 6625, "A bill to appropriate the sum of $136,000 to pay the owners of the Fort Brown reservation, in Texas, for rents due thereon by the Government from 1846 to 1884," be furnished to-day if possible, I have the honor to state that the Quartermaster-General of the Army, to whom the subject was referred, reports under date of the 30th ultimo, as follows:

"In the opinion of the Quartermaster-General the rental value of the site of Fort Brown from 1846 to 1866 was at least equal to $2,500 per annum, which for twenty years makes a sum of $50,000. There is no question in his mind that from 1866 to date the value of the rental, considered relatively to prices paid for similar property in the State of Texas, was and is at least $3,600 per annum, which for eighteen years gives a sum of $64,800, or a total sum of $114,800. The difference between this calculation and the sum named in the bill, namely, $21,200, is a fair, equitable amount to offset deferred payment and the natural differences of opinion that arise in determining values of this land. It was alleged in 1873 and 1874 that the property was taxed at or about $1,000 per annum. Estimates of the value of this site have varied from $25,000 to $75,000."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Mr. MAXEY. As I was going on to state, from 1846 up to May, 1861, the United States Government occupied this property for governmental purposes, paying no rent therefor and claiming no title to the land. Then from the conclusion of the war up to the present time the United States have had the continuous occupation, use, and enjoyment of the property, paying no rent therefor, and to-day have it.

The Government—and I will say for myself that I regard that as an unwise thing to do, but it has been done—has placed upon that reservation about half a million dollars' worth of valuable property. The War Department has always regarded a fort at Fort Brown, where it now is, as a necessary of the frontier defense, and it always will be so.

The only question remaining is, was the House right in granting to the owners of the soil pay for the use of the soil? About that, in my mind, there can be no sort of question.

The next point is, is the amount in the bill reasonable? I have caused the letter of the Secretary of War to be read approving that amount, which embodies the report of the Quartermaster-General, giving a specific statement showing that the amount asked for is reasonable and proper. The House allowed it; and I am entirely unprepared to see any good reason why it should not be retained by the Senate. I ask the Senate to retain the action of the House.

Mr. HALE. This item covers a very old matter and a matter of some importance from its amount. No papers whatever were furnished to the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate, no evidence of any kind, and the committee searched to see if it was submitted as an estimate of a deficiency by the head of any Department, and did not find that it had been.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator will pardon me. I had no doubt the committee was acting unadvisedly for want of knowledge; but I have had the letter of the Secretary of War put on record to show that the action of the House was right, and the papers were in the House.

Mr. HALE. The matter seemed to be of that importance that the committee investigated it and conferred with the head of the War Department upon it and learned all the facts in relation to the case, and it struck out the item upon these grounds: first, that it is too much; second, that it is not a deficiency proper; third, that what the Government should do, whenever it does anything, is to buy this property and close up all claims not only for rent but for title, so that no further questions can arise. It was helped forward in that conclusion by the fact that we learned that some time ago an appropriation was made for the purpose of purchasing this property not adequate according to the claims and prices of the owners; but it finally struck out this item, and it ought to be struck out so that in conference between the two Houses what should be done is not that a large sum should be paid for the rent of this property, but that the whole question should be closed up and an appropriation made and proper authority given to the War Department to negotiate for the purchase of the title entire of this property so that it shall be cleaned out.

I hope the Senate will leave the matter in this way in order that that may be brought about in conference between the two Houses. That is all the Senators from Texas could desire.

Mr. MAXEY. I only desire to add to what I have already stated that the question of title was never definitely settled until by the Supreme Court in the case of Brownsville vs. Cavazos, to which I have referred in 100 United States Reports, or 10 Otto, and that decision was entered at the October term, 1879. Up to that time the United States could not pay the rent. It had to hold the property as in hand as a stakeholder for whomsoever might be entitled to it, and so it was held. Now the question of title is settled; and while I appreciate what the Senator from Maine says in regard to the bill, that this might be an item of leverage in the hands of the Government to get a better trade for the purchase of the property, the question is not that, but are these owners entitled to rent for their property, and is the amount reasonable? They are entitled, because the title is in them as shown by the decision. The amount is reasonable, as shown by the War Department and by the careful investigation of the Quartermaster-General, who makes this statement; and I will say in addition that General Holabird, who makes this report, was deputy quartermaster-general for Texas for years and personally knows all about it, and the report made by him is entitled to the fullest weight. He makes the statement that the amount is reasonable, so that it seems to me there should be no sort of question that this is a just and righteous claim, that the House is right about it, and that the Senate ought to disagree with the committee in striking out this provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, the former vote being regarded as not having been taken.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator insists on a vote I shall go into this matter more fully. It is not a matter that Senators on full explanations will see their way clear to vote for.

Mr. MAXEY. I have no desire to delay the bill. I have stated to the Senate just what I thought about it, and I know the facts of the case as well as the Senator does. I have them certified here. If the Senator believes this matter can be settled in conference, I am perfectly willing to have it done. I have placed the evidence on record so that it can be referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee, striking out the item from line 505 to line 515, inclusive, of section 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 43, at the end of line 1038 of section 1, at the request of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who is absent, I offer the following amendment:

That the Attorney-General be authorized and directed to pay to Charles H. Reed, for services as counsel for the late Charges J. Guiteau, such sum as he may deem just and reasonable, not to exceed $3,000.

The amendment were agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. On page 73, after the word "cents," in line 355 of section 3, I move to insert:

And any existing law limiting the presentation of any claim for horses lost in the military service of the United States, where the loss is reported on the Department roll by the proper officer, is hereby repealed.

Mr. HALE. I do not know enough about that to agree to it, and must make the point of order that it changes existing law.

Mr. SLATER. I hope the Senator will not raise the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I will withhold it for the present.

Mr. SLATER. There are a large number of claims, particularly from the Pacific States, for horses that were lost a number of years ago, in 1855 and 1856. Money has been appropriated to pay for them. The loss was shown on the rolls of the Department when those rolls came in. I understand there is now a statute that forbids the presentation of such claims after five years. The records of the Department show that the property was lost, show that the parties were entitled to compensation, and the value at which the horses were appraised when they entered the service. It seems to me the Government can not well stand on a position of that kind when its own records and rolls show that the property was lost and who was entitled to it. I think it hardly stands in a correct position to say it will not pay a debt which its own records show it owes.

Mr. HALE. I do not feel justified in withdrawing the point of order and opening a new class of cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken. The amendment is not in order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLAN. In pursuance of notice given this morning, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7012, being the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair deems it his duty to lay the unfinished business before the Senate, the bill having been completed for the consideration of which the unfinished business was informally laid aside. The bill which is the unfinished business will be read by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection this bill will be informally laid aside for the purpose of entertaining the motion of the Senator from Minnesota. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. Has that bill been reported to-day?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It was reported yesterday.

Mr. INGALLS. I am quite sure that my colleague [Mr PLUMB] desires to continue the consideration of the land-grant-forfeiture bill. I understand the river and harbor bill was reported yesterday and recommitted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It was reported the day before yesterday and recommitted, and again reported back yesterday. I think the Senator's colleague was aware that the river and harbor bill would be called up to-day.

Mr. INGALLS. He is absent.

Mr. MCMILLAN. But I gave notice this morning.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] informed me this morning that he expected the land-forfeiture bill to come up this evening.

Mr. MCMILLAN. After we pass the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The land-forfeiture bill, being the unfinished business, having been laid before the Senate it was informally laid aside without objection for the purpose of entertaining the request made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN]. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill, so called. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that in compliance with the request of the Senate the House returned to the Senate the bill (S. 315) granting a pension to William Reinhardt.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN of Indiana, Mr. JOHN HANCOCK of Texas, and Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON of Illinois managers at the conference on the part of the House.

WILLIAM REINHARDT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 28, 1884.

Ordered, That the Clerk of the House be directed to return to the Senate in compliance with its request——

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Missouri is the Senator who is chiefly interested in making some changes in the bill. He is not here. I think I will not call it up until Monday morning.

Mr. FARLEY. We can not understand over here what is going on.

Mr. HAWLEY. The presiding officer was about to lay before the Senate a conference report on the joint resolution to print the agricultural report, but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is the one who has manifested the chief interest in certain changes; he is not here, and I ask that it lie over until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill the Chair was about to lay before the Senate is not the bill the Senator from Connecticut refers to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 28, 1884.

Ordered, That the Clerk of the House be directed to return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 315) granting a pension to William Reinhardt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote by which the bill was passed will be reconsidered, if there be no objection, and the bill postponed indefinitely. The Chair hears no objection to that course, and it is so ordered.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first reading of the bill will be dispensed with if there is no objection, and the bill will be read by paragraphs for amendments.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The amendments of the Committee on Commerce being considered first.

Mr. GEORGE. Under that arrangement can we offer amendments to each paragraph as it is read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by paragraphs for the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Commerce. After they have been gone through with, the bill will be open to further amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course if any Senator desires to amend an amendment of the committee, it will be in order to offer it now; otherwise not.

Mr. HOAR. Is it intended that when a particular paragraph is reached, and amendments of the committee to that paragraph have been disposed of, other amendments to the same paragraph shall be delayed until the end of the bill, or shall they be made at that time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request which is made is to consider the committee amendments as reached in order. The bill will be read by paragraphs for the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Commerce, there being no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it necessary in order to have the amendments of the committee disposed of to read anything except the amendments proposed by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be taken on the amendments offered by the committee as they are reached.

Mr. GEORGE. It is a very long bill. Is it necessary to read anything except the amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule the reading of the bill can not be dispensed with.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 317 of section 1, to insert:

Improving Coos Bay, Oregon: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty" in the amendment; so as to make the sum $30,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SLATER. This is a very important improvement. There has been expended, I think, $100,000 in three different appropriations—one of $40,000 and two each of $30,000. The recommendation of the Engineer Department for the coming year is $150,000. The breakwater, or training-wall as it is called, has now extended to deep water, and $30,000 is the very lowest estimate that will really amount to continuing the improvement for the coming season, and it will extend the wall to a very short distance. It ought to receive $50,000.

I understand that the committees of both Houses to a certain extent have endeavored to be controlled by appropriating about one-third of the amount recommended by the Engineer Department. In this instance they have given only one-sixth. I do not think this is treating this improvement as it ought to be treated, as its deserts both as to locality and as to importance require that it should be treated. I really feel as if I ought to move for $50,000. That would make it equal to one-third, and put it on an equality with other points. But I prefer not to do that, feeling that perhaps the Senate would hardly be willing to go to that point. Therefore I shall content myself with simply moving to increase the amount from $25,000 to $30,000, and I trust there will be no objection to this.

It may be said that the committee of the Senate have been quite liberal with Oregon in making appropriations at other points. That is true, but I do not feel disposed to stand to allow an important place in the State to be overslaughed and to receive less consideration at the hands of Congress than it deserves, simply because some other parts of the State have been better remembered. I hope the amendment I have offered will be adopted.

Mr. DOLPH. I agree with all that has been said by my colleague in regard to the importance of this work. One hundred thousand dollars has already been expended for the improvement of the mouth of the bay. Six hundred thousand dollars is estimated as the total cost of the work. For some reason as the bill came from the House no appropriation was made for this work.

It is true that the Senate Committee on Commerce has been liberal with Oregon in the additions that it has made to the bill. However, there is but one work which I recall now, which has received more than 33⅓ per cent. of the estimates, while some of the most important works have received only 30 per cent. The only improvement that I now recall to my mind which has received more than 33⅓ per cent. of the estimate is the mouth of Yaquina Bay. The Coos Bay improvement has been allowed, as has been said, only one-sixth of the entire estimate. I do not know how far as a member of the Committee on Commerce I am considered at liberty to antagonize the report of the committee, but I want to insist on the amendment, and I should be very glad to have the appropriation increased to a proper proportion of the entire estimate made by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not insist upon this amendment. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate have very materially increased the appropriations for the State of Oregon as the bill came from the House to the Senate. As has been stated by the Senator from Oregon nearest to me [Mr. DOLPH], the House omitted wholly to make any appropriation for Coos Bay, but the Senate, in view of the improvement, of the locality, and of its importance, consented to insert in this bill $25,000. We have also appropriated for another harbor upon the Pacific coast in the State of Oregon, Yaquina Bay, an increase of $10,000 over the House appropriation of $40,000, making the appropriation for Yaquina Bay $50,000. These two harbors are on the Pacific coast in Oregon. They are important places there, and the committee thought they were doing full justice to the State of Oregon in giving the appropriation we have here, and that this improvement of Coos Bay, receiving $25,000 at this time, could be carried on advantageously to the locality; and in justice to other improvements in the bill, not only in Oregon but throughout the country, this is as much as ought to be appropriated at that point at this time. I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SLATER. I am very glad to be assured that the committee desired to do full justice to this work, but the facts are that they did not do it or anything near it. The reports of the Engineer Department show that they did not as compared with the other points. They give us but 16 per cent. of what was recommended. It is true that another bay on the coast of Oregon has been awarded an appropriation, but I shall move there for an increase, and I think I shall offer very good reasons for such increase. But these ports are in no wise connected with or dependent on each other, but entirely separate from each other, and their business is entirely distinct, and they are for communities entirely separate and distinct.

I might call the attention of the Senate to another consideration in regard to Oregon, that a line of mountains extending parallel to the coast shuts off the interior of the State from the coast except at two or three points. Already steps are being taken to connect Coos Bay with the interior of the State at Roseburg; property has been purchased by capitalists with a view of constructing a railroad, and probably before another year shall have passed or even reached us a railroad will be in course of construction.

The commerce of this place is very considerable in the coastwise business, and this last season two large ocean steamers for ocean service was built there. I think some fifteen or sixteen vessels are in the trade between Coos Bay and San Francisco and other points. It is very important also that some deeper water should be had on the bar in order that they may be able to compete with other points in the shipment of lumber and coal.

Of course it will take a number of appropriations to reach the point contemplated by the Engineer Department here. Six hundred thousand dollars is supposed to be what will be required to complete this improvement. The Senate will see at once how long it will take if they are to give only $25,000 yearly until this work shall be completed. I think I am really derelict myself in not insisting upon $50,000. I hope the Senate will add the $5,000 I ask.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senate will vote down this amendment of the Senator from Oregon. The committee have very carefully considered the question in regard to this harbor particularly, because it is an original item in this bill; and if the House had considered it of such vast importance it certainly would not have omitted it.

If the Senator would insist upon having such a proportion of the estimates applied to all the objects of improvement which are contained in this bill the bill could not for a moment be entertained; and in view of the proportion given to the improvements in his State, with two harbors already on the coast, and the only important one which is reached now or prospectively by a railroad is the Yaquina Bay, and that we have considered and fully provided for. I hope the Senator will see the propriety of not insisting on this; but if he does I sincerely hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

Mr. SLATER. I certainly shall insist on it, and if I am voted down I shall call for the yeas and nays, if I can get them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SLATER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when Mr. JACKSON'S name was called). I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] was called home some days ago. He is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 22, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Beck,	Fair,	Lamar,	Slater,

Cullom,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,	Walker,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Wilson.
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 321 of section 1, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Yaquina Bay, Oregon: Continuing improvement" from $40,000 to $50,000.

Mr. SLATER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "fifty" and inserting "sixty-five;" so as to make the sum $65,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SLATER. I regret that I am under the necessity of making these motions; but as a representative of the State of Oregon I feel that I am under obligations to the people of that State to look to their interests and represent them to the best of my ability.

This improvement has had, I think, $110,000 expended on it. It is a new improvement and somewhat peculiarly situated. As I remarked a little while ago upon the former amendment, parallel to the coast is the Coast Range of mountains, which separates the largest body of agricultural land and the heaviest portion of the settlements of the State from the ocean. As at present situated, the entire commerce of the State must go to the northwest corner of the State before it can find egress to the ocean. This improvement is opposite the center of that great valley, the Willamette, sixty miles distant. A railroad is already in process of construction from the seaboard toward the interior of the State; most of the grading is done, three large and extensive tunnels are about completed, and about five miles of the track are already laid.

Within the last two months the company that is constructing this road, opening a new avenue of commerce to the people of the State, have paid $26,000 revenue to the Government of the United States as impost duties upon the iron that they are laying down on this road, and before they will be able to complete the road to a point where it will be valuable to themselves or to the community for whom they are building it they will have paid into the Treasury of the United States for customs alone as many dollars as have been appropriated and as I am now asking to be appropriated. So the Government of the United States is simply allowing these people to have the revenue that comes to the Treasury by virtue of the improvements that they are making. In this particular this work is peculiarly situated. You are simply allowing, if this amendment be adopted, this company to invest in an improvement of the Government money that they bring to the Government by the iron they are laying down on their road.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I should like to know if that principle were adopted as a general proposition through all the States how the Government could be carried on?

Mr. SLATER. That is a very proper question, and as matter of course if carried to an extreme point the principle would be one that could not be applied, but this case is exceptional. They are building across a mountain range which they must pass before they can receive one dollar's benefit, or before the community for whose benefit they are building can receive any advantages from the construction of the road.

It is confessed that this bay is an important point, important to the commerce of that State, and important to be improved by the United States. Now, I present the case in this way. The very improvement these people are making furnishes the Government the means wherewith to improve the harbor, and in that respect I say it is peculiar. I doubt whether you can find scarcely another place in the United States where a similar condition of facts exists.

The engineers recommend $140,000 for the continuation of this work the coming year. Now it is true, taking the standard that has been adopted by the House and Senate committees—that is to say, giving about one-third—the sum of $50,000 proposed would be fully equal or a little more than equal to the one-third suggested; but the conditions here are different; the emergencies are different. Within the next few months it is believed that the Yaquina Bay will be connected by rail with the Willamette Valley. It is important that this work should be so far completed that vessels of considerable draught can pass the bar. They now have twenty feet on the bar at high tide. The expenditure of $65,000 or $75,000 more will probably give them twenty-two or twenty-three feet. You will see the importance of this if they succeed this fall in taking out a portion of the valley crop over this bar. It is important to get as much draught as they can; but I do not expect any great amount of the present crop to go out this fall, but by another year they can be prepared to transport the entire crop of the valley, and this appropriation will place them in a position to accommodate the people.

This I say is a case that requires consideration. This improvement being made will more quickly, more readily, and immediately supply a demand that is needed there than any other improvement in the State of Oregon. A larger body of people is interested in the immediate improvement of this bay than in the immediate improvement of any other locality in the State.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate sundry bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

The bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. The Chair does not know whether the bill ought to go to the Committee on Private Land Claims or the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BAYARD. The bill would properly go to the Committee on Private Land Claims, I suppose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be so referred, if there be no objection.

The bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 3950) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLATT subsequently said: Finding that House bill 3950 is identical with a Senate bill which has been passed by this body, I ask that the vote referring it to the Committee on Patents may be reconsidered and that the bill may lie on the table. I shall call it up hereafter and ask to have it passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote referring the bill to the Committee on Patents will be reconsidered if there be no objection, and the bill will lie on the table for the present.

The bill (H. R. 257) for the relief of John P. Gregson and Francis H. Ellison was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (H. R. 5682) to repeal section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1861, and to declare the forfeiture of the land-grant therein made, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 5452) for the relief of John W. Martin was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 78) to provide for the retirement of Col. Henry J. Hunt as a major-general of the United States Army was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 807) for the relief of Mary A. Lee was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 1299) for the relief of Alonzo Gesner was read twice by its title.

Mr. SLATER. I ask that that bill may lie on the table for the present. I shall call it up hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table if there be no objection.

The bill (H. R. 1073) granting a pension to William J. Lee was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SLATER to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SLATER. I was saying, when interrupted, that the improvement of Yaquina Bay with the connection of the road that is now being constructed would more immediately and quickly relieve a large portion of the people of the State than any other expenditure being made in that State, or on the borders of that State. It will bring them from the heart of the valley within thirty-six hours of San Francisco instead of fifty-two hours from Portland, with an addition, as is now required, of about twelve hours to go to Portland, making a difference of about one-half the time. It will be also a competing line with our present transportation route. It is to that point more perhaps than to any other that our people look with interest to the completion of this work.

I do not wish to detain the Senate, because I am very well aware that time is precious. I trust that the Senate will sustain the amendment that I have offered.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I do not propose to trouble myself much about the river and harbor bill. Still I like to see fair and reasonable justice done. The committee, on page 14, inserted a new item for Oregon of $25,000, and that has already been increased by the Senate. The item now under consideration was, in the House bill, $40,000, was increased by the committee $10,000, and now the Senator asks a further increase. I call the attention of the Senate to page 32 of the bill. The first thing I strike is a new item for improving the mouth of the Columbia River, Oregon, $150,000, an increase. Then I strike an item for improving Upper Columbia and Snake Rivers, Oregon. The House appropriated $10,000. The Senate committee have recommended $20,000, an increase of $10,000 more. Then for Willamette River above Portland, Oreg., continuing improvement, the House appropriated $5,000; the Senate committee, $10,000. Then I strike another item, a new one:

Improving mouth of Coquille River, Oregon: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The Committee on Commerce, having one member from the State of Oregon, as persistent, as earnest, as importunate a beggar for his State as I ever encountered in my life, has been impelled under the influence of it to give the State of Oregon four times the increase it has given any other State in the United States.

If the Senate is determined to take item after item here, as proposed by the Senators from Oregon, and increase each one of them over what the committee has already voted to increase, where in the name of common sense is this bill to end? In death, of course.

I never had anything to do with a river and harbor bill before, and it was a curiosity to me. The Senate committee undertook to cut down the House appropriations in the bill. They cut them down about $800,000. That bill was printed, and in less than six hours from the time the knowledge came to be circulated as to the items so cut down by the Committee on Commerce, almost every single item was back, and it left this bill coming from the Senate Committee without any practical reduction in the recommendations of the House of Representatives, and with an increase of over a million and a half dollars proposed by the Senate committee. If the Senate of the United States is going to add to the million and a half increase the committee have recommended two or three millions more, Senators know what will become of the bill; it will die.

There is not an instance in the bill where the Engineer Department having the work in charge has not, under the law, said to the Congress of the United States that it was a work that public necessity, the interests of commerce, demanded; and there is hardly an instance in the bill where the bill recommends one-third of the amount which the engineer in charge says can be properly and ought to be expended this coming year. If you appropriate under the estimates of the engineer what he recommends, or one-half what he recommends, you would have a river and harbor bill of $24,000,000 this year.

Oregon is not the State to be recognized in the Senate as the one to receive favors in this matter. Her favors have been received in the committee, and abundantly received. There is not a State represented by a Senator who voted "yea" on the last amendment that has been treated as well as Oregon, with the same recommendations, too, of the engineers, I am not apportioning these appropriations to States; I say only take the engineers' reports. You may take the State of Georgia, you may take the State of Delaware, or of Florida, the engineers' reports show just as important improvements, just as much required for the interests of commerce as the improvements in the State of Oregon. Yet here is an addition made by the committee to Oregon of nearly $300,000. I say it is not just, it is not fair for the Senator from Oregon to be insisting on an increase, and probably when we reach page 32 other amendments will be offered. I simply speak this as a notice to the Senate of what may be expected, provided the Senate puts additional amendments to the committee amendments all through the bill.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, I desire to say in good part to the Senator from Maine that I think I am quite as well qualified to judge of whatever relates to the interest of Oregon as he is, and I propose to stand here and defend and represent to the best of my ability the interests of that State.

The trouble is, the Congress of the United States has undertaken to put this great country of 50,000,000 people in a straight jacket, and they can not do it. We are developing and progressing with such rapidity that Congress does not keep pace with the developments of the country. Instead of the river and harbor appropriation bill being $12,000,000 or $15,000,000, it ought to be $25,000,000 every year. It is because you keep it far below what it ought to be, far below what the necessities of the country demand, far below what the requirements of commerce are, that we find ourselves in such a condition that we can not do justice to this and other places. When the Senate of the United States will take the stand and maintain it of making the necessary and proper appropriations for each particular place as its requirements demand then we shall have reached a point where the country will be satisfied with the appropriations.

It is true that in some other parts of Oregon very liberal appropriations have been made, but not in any degree beyond the requirements of that part of the country. I will not stand here and see one place overridden and deprived of what is its proper and just rights and not resent it because I am told that some other place in my State has had fair and liberal appropriations. I do not understand my duty in that way. I know that in this case a little more than one-third has been given, but this is a case of peculiar conditions and circumstances which I have endeavored to present to the Senate. In point of fact, every dollar that was recommended ought to be given. The whole $140,000 ought to be given, though I am not asking that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator inform me what percentage of the amount recommended the committee have agreed to give?

Mr. SLATER. They have given a little over 40 per cent. as it now stands.

Mr. FRYE. A good deal more than it averages through the bill as it now stands.

Mr. SLATER. That may be.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is that the average?

Mr. FRYE. It is more than the average; it is twice the average.

Mr. SLATER. But in another important point they only gave us about 16 per cent., and in some other places they have not given us one-third. As I stated before I do not care to dwell upon this matter, but I shall not sit in my seat and see one portion of my State trodden down and deprived of its just and proper rights because some other part of it has been very fortunate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, I think there is not much danger of any portion of the State of Oregon being unjustly treated or trodden under foot. I concur with the views of the Senator from Oregon that the river and harbor bill should be increased in its aggregate amount, because the development of this country is going on so rapidly that we must be prepared for making larger appropriations for the improvements which will be found necessary if the commerce of the country is to be sustained.

But in the application of the Senator's [Mr. SLATER'S] remarks to the particular appropriation under discussion I think the Senator is mistaken. Coos Bay, as I understand from the reports of the engineers, is really a more important place at present than Yaquina Bay. The railroad which is projected from the Willamette River to Yaquina Bay has been in process of construction a long time. We were told two years ago that the railroad was in process of construction; but it is not yet completed, it is not at the harbor, and it will not be there for some time, and that time is very indefinite. We can not make appropriations in anticipation of the necessities of a harbor.

This improvement has already received great favor at the hands of Congress. It was commenced in 1869. The original estimate of the engineers for the entire improvement was $465,000. There have been appropriated $110,000 in annual appropriations to this time, and now it is proposed to add to that $50,000 more. A vessel drawing thirteen feet in one or two instances has passed into the harbor with the improvements that have been made, as is stated by the engineer in charge of the improvement who makes the report.

What are the commercial statistics of Yaquina Harbor? Yaquina Bay is in the collection district of Yaquina. The following is furnished by Mr. Coll Van Cleve, the collector of customs:

Revenue collected June 1, 1883, one year, $53.85.
Coastwise arrivals from 1st of October, 1882, to June, 1883, 14.
Coastwise arrivals, registered tonnage, 930 tons.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him on that point?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Not knowing exactly for what purpose the Senator is reading these statistics, I wish to inquire if the appropriations in the bill are generally made with reference to the real commerce of a port?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Either the present commerce or what is——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Expected?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Immediately.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I understand the Senator to read those statistics, if he will permit me——

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, I do not read the statistics for the purpose of showing that Yaquina Bay is not a harbor of some importance. It will be an important place in the future and in the not distant future; there will be commerce there. A channel of thirteen feet ought to support a very considerable amount of commerce, and that exists there now. When the railroad which is projected to this point from the Willamette Valley is completed, doubtless there will be a very decided increase of commerce, and that harbor will be an important one.

It is important now in other respects than in a mere commercial point of view, because it is about midway between San Francisco and the mouth of the Columbia River, as I understand; but the appropriation proposed now is $50,000 for this year, and the question is whether it is not sufficient for this annual appropriation. It is more than one-third of the amount estimated by the engineer as the sum that can be profitably expended during the year. As a general rule, one-third of the estimate is referred to as a fair standard. Although that is not the invariable rule, I am free to say, where the immediate necessities of commerce do not demand a much larger increase than that, it should not be made for this annual appropriation.

The committee have endeavored to deal fairly in this matter because they have recognized the importance of the Pacific coast, especially of the Northern Pacific coast and of the harbors there. While the Senator is zealous in favor of the improvement of his State, and is justly so, I think he should be satisfied with this amount and with the action of the committee in increasing the appropriation of the House $10,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SLATER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Improving Lubec Channel, Maine: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, under the unanimous agreement, will not be in order until the committee amendments have been acted upon.

Mr. KENNA. I was not in the Senate at the time the agreement was made. However, I ask that by unanimous consent the amendment may be disposed of now, for the reason that I am on a subcommittee, which is occupied, and it would be a great inconvenience, probably, to me to be in the Senate at the conclusion of the bill. If there be any sort of objection to the consideration of the amendment at this time, of course I shall not press the request.

Mr. McMILLAN. I prefer that the Senator should wait until the committee amendments are through with.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to offer an amendment at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it an amendment to an amendment proposed by the committee, or an amendment to the text?

Mr. VANCE. It is an amendment to the text of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By a unanimous agreement of the Senate the amendments of the Committee on Commerce are to be first acted upon.

Mr. VANCE. The amendment is not in order now, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will not be in order until the committee amendments shall have been disposed of.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 472 of section 1, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out lines 555 and 556 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Steele's Bayou, Mississippi, $2,500.

Mr. GEORGE. That is an amendment offered to this bill by the committee which I hope will not be adopted for the reasons which I will now state. I know no reason why the amendment has been proposed to the bill.

Steele's Bayou is a navigable stream some eighty-five miles long, running through about the richest country naturally that is in the United States, a country not fully settled and developed; but already on the banks of that bayou are raised from ten to twelve thousand bales of cotton for shipment. It has never been improved. It was not known commercially, I believe, until 1863 when the United States gunboats came through and navigated it. Only for the last two or three years has it been navigated by the smallest steamers, one with a capacity of five hundred bales of cotton and the other with a capacity of about two hundred bales of cotton. The engineer in charge, Mr. Miller—and I wish to be understood——

Mr. CONGER. The Senator will permit me a moment. I understood—and I am fortified by what the chairman of the committee says to me—after the Senator had appeared before the committee and explained about this stream and one or two more, the Big Black and the Yallabusha, that those items were to be restored; but I see they are not.

Mr. GEORGE. That was my understanding.

Mr. CONGER. That was my understanding, but it seems that by some means they were not restored in the hurry of passing over these things; but for myself as one of the committee—and the chairman agrees with me—considering that they were intended to be restored and have not been, I have no objection to the report of the committee being nonconcurred in as to this and the next two amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. How about Steele's Bayou?

Mr. CONGER. That is what I am speaking of, Steele's Bayou, Big Black River, and the Yallabusha River. After the Senator appeared before the committee my memorandum shows that his statement was satisfactory to the committee, and they were to be restored. That is my private memorandum; and by talking with the chairman of the committee I find that he also understood it so.

Mr. GEORGE. What I desire to know is whether the Senator's statement referred also to Steele's Bayou on page 23?

Mr. CONGER. I said my memorandum included the restoration of Steele's Bayou, and on the next page the Big Black River and Yallabusha River; but in the next clause for a survey of Yazoo Pass, what was stricken out the committee did not intend to restore.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I ask non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. CONGER. These are small amounts, and after the statements of citizens down there my memorandum shows that the committee agreed to restore the items.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is to be put in the affirmative form on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that the committee agrees that Steele's Bayou shall be restored.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out lines 555 and 556.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, to strike out lines 557 and 558 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Big Black River, Mississippi, $5,000.

Mr. GEORGE. The same order is to be taken there.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, to strike out lines 561 and 562 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Yallabusha River, Mississippi: Continuing improvement, $2,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment striking out lines 561 and 562 will be considered as disagreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that lines 557 and 558 have been restored to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment was not agreed to. That restores the paragraph as it was in the House bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Have lines 561 and 562 been restored?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after the word "improvement," in line 564 of section 1, to strike out "and also a survey of Yazoo Pass to determine the cost of a lock at that place;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Yazoo River, Mississippi: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 567 of section 1, to increase the appropriation for "improving Bayou Black, Louisiana: Continuing improvement" from $3,500 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 577 of section 1, after the word "Louisiana," to insert "from mouth to Stein's Bluff;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Bayou D'Arbonne, Louisiana, from mouth to Stein's Bluff, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 596 of section 1, after the word "follows," to strike out:

Not exceeding $15,000 for revetment to protect bank at Alexandria from damage by the current of the river.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Red River, Louisiana and Arkansas: Continuing improvement from the Atchafalaya to Fulton, Ark., $75,000, to be expended as follows: Not exceeding $5,000 to close the outlet of the river known as Sale and Murphy's Canal; the remainder (including whatever balance may remain unexpended from above improvements embraced in this paragraph) to be applied to the improvement of the main channel of the river.

Mr. CONGER. The order of the committee in regard to that (which does not appear here) was to strike out the word "bank" and insert "harbor," and restore the clause with that change; so as to read if left in:

Not exceeding $15,000 for revetment to protect the harbor at Alexandria from damage by the current of the river.

I offer that amendment from the committee. I move to amend the part proposed to be stricken out by striking out the word "bank" and inserting "the harbor."

Mr. JONAS. And then restoring the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. CONGER. And then to non-concur in striking out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that perhaps the result would be reached better by disagreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee. That would leave the text as it stood, and then whatever amendment——

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that that correction be made.

Mr. HARRIS. An amendment to the words proposed to be stricken out is first in order. The Senator from Michigan is right in proposing to amend the clause now if he chooses to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly it is in order. The Senator will propose his amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the word "bank" and insert the words "the harbor."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now the question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce to strike out the clause as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out lines 612 and 613 of section 1, as follows:

For survey of the Arkansas River from Little Rock to mouth, $19,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 627 of section 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "ten;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "of which $20,000 shall be expended in the improvement of the river and $15,000 for the survey thereof;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving White River, Arkansas: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 631 of section 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "of which sum $4,000 are to be expended for a dredge-boat;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Saint Francis River, Arkansas: Continuing improvement, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 634 of section 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-six" and insert "twenty;" and in line 635, after the word "dollars," to strike out "and for preventing erosion of the harbor at Fort Smith, Ark., $5,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For removing obstructions in the Arkansas River from its mouth to Wichita, Kans., $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 645 of section 1, to strike out:

And between Nashville and the foot of Smith's Shoals, $20,000; of which sum $8,000 are to be expended between the Kentucky State line and Smith Shoals: Provided, That such improvements shall, as far as possible, be made with reference to the last report of the engineer in charge.

So that the clause will read:

Improving Cumberland River, Tennessee and Kentucky: Continuing improvement below Nashville, including bar at mouth of the river, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 651 of section 1, to insert:

For the improvement of the Cumberland River above Nashville, $50,000; and such improvement shall be made according to the recommendations of Maj. W. R. King, engineer in charge, contained in the letter of the Secretary of War, March 15, 1884, Senate Executive Document No. 129, first session Forty-eighth Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 671 of section 1, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Tennessee River, Tennessee, Alabama, and Kentucky: Continuing improvement below Chattanooga (including Muscle Shoals and shoal at Reynoldsburg), $250,000.

Mr. PUGH. I hope that the Senate will not agree to that amendment. I am very much in earnest in asking the Senate to adhere to the House appropriation for this improvement; and that the Senate may understand something of the importance of this House appropriation I will read from the engineer's report:

The navigable portion of the Tennessee River, between Chattanooga and its mouth at Paducah, a distance of four hundred and fifty-three miles, is divided into two unequal sections by the great Muscle Shoals obstruction between Florence and Decatur, Ala. This obstruction, exclusive of certain portions already navigable, is twenty-three miles long, and will when removed allow free navigation between the upper Tennessee and its tributaries and the lower Tennessee and Ohio Rivers.

Toward this improvement the Government has already expended $2,000,000 upon the Muscle Shoals alone. The work is approaching completion. The estimate for the completion made by the engineer is $700,000, and he reports that with $350,000 appropriated at this session and $350,000 the next session he can complete the improvement the next year and open up this navigation from Paducah to Chattanooga, a distance of four hundred and fifty-three miles.

It seems to me that to allow the expenditure already made upon these shoals, $2,000,000, to stand without any profit whatever to any human being, is bad policy. By the expenditure of $700,000 this and the next year the navigation can be opened all along the river for four hundred and fifty-three miles, and until that work is completed the two millions already expended lie there utterly profitless to any human being. The engineer in charge of the work has written a letter upon the subject which I beg leave to read. It is dated May 1, 1884:

In further reply to your telegram of this morning, I will say that the estimate given in the annual report is for completing the existing project, and is based upon the original estimate, which will not only complete the Muscle Shoals work, but will put the entire river in the best condition for navigation. With $700,000, and probably with a smaller sum, if the funds are available so as not to stop the work again after we get started, boats can be got through the canal and this will make the entire river navigable, even if no other appropriation was ever made.

Upon these facts I beg the Senate to adhere to the appropriation made by the unanimous report of the House committee, as I am informed.

Mr. MAXEY. What is the depth of the water on the Muscle Shoals?

Mr. PUGH. I really do not remember; I suppose about twelve feet.

Mr. HARRIS. I agree with the Senator from Alabama in the belief that true economy demands that this appropriation should be made as provided by the House. Not very long ago—one or two years, I forget which—by reason of the exhaustion of the appropriation, or rather by reason of a diversion of a part of it, the work had to be stopped, and one or two hundred trained laborers already collected and camped upon the ground, fully understanding the work and progressing with it rapidly, were compelled to be discharged, disbanded, and scattered off. If this appropriation is made as provided by the House, the $350,000 for this year, and a similar appropriation shall be made next year, we are positively assured by the engineer in charge of the work that this great work at the Muscle Shoals can be completed and so improved as to give free navigation the whole length of the river. If it is the purpose of Congress, as I doubt not it is, to complete that work, why delay it?

Why economize by withholding an appropriation of $100,000 now, which is necessary, when the result can only be to continue the work one, two, or three years longer than is necessary to complete it? I very much hope that the Committee on Commerce will see the propriety of allowing this amendment to be disagreed to, and the appropriation as provided by the House continued in the bill.

Mr. CONGER. The committee are aware that there has been no work in the Southern States undertaken of this magnitude costing so much that is more important than the work referred to.

The navigation above the Muscle Shoals has settled into a system suited to the river above that point, and the navigation below the Muscle Shoals has its own class of boats. The navigation down these shoals consists in running the shoals at high water with some kind of craft, but not intended to run up and down the river above or below.

I think that improvement of a long river reaching from the Ohio River around through several States is a very important work, and Congress has admitted it to be so and made very liberal appropriations to carry it on. The navigation above the shoals, taking out some twenty-eight or thirty miles at the shoals, extends for some hundreds of miles now without interruption and will not be changed whether this work is done or not. So it is below. The point about it is how much is necessary to carry on the work of the improvement with economy, and as well as it can be carried on.

We are here now at the 1st of July substantially. If another river and harbor bill is passed at all by this Congress, it must be passed before the 3d of March next. Appropriations in the river and harbor act are by the terms of the bill available as soon as the appropriation is made. They are not confined to any fiscal year, but may be taken up and expended immediately after the bill becomes a law, as the exigency of the works may require. I have been familiar with this work from its commencement, having been on the Committee on Commerce in the House; I have seen its importance, and have always been favorable to very full appropriations for such a work as this is; and it was my opinion and is my opinion that $250,000 is all that can profitably be expended before another appropriation bill will be passed, if one be passed at all.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me? I grant that perhaps $250,000 are as much as can be expended economically and profitably between now and the 4th of March next; but the appropriation bill that will then be passed will take effect only from the 1st of July following, and the only thing we could do in March would be to provide a deficiency, if a deficiency was necessary. This appropriation, if made, is made for the fiscal year, as the appropriation made in March next will be for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. CONGER. I am not mistaken in this, that no river and harbor bill confines its appropriations to a fiscal year. The bill itself has a clause at the last that all the moneys hereby appropriated shall be immediately available, and there is nothing said in the bill and nothing has ever been said in an appropriation bill for rivers and harbors that it shall be for any particular year, as other appropriation bills are. This bill provides the same as all bills do; and the clause to which I have alluded is put in for extra precaution.

I do not wish to antagonize this work; but I think the action of Congress for many years past, the large appropriations we have made for this work show that it is believed by Congress to be one of the important works of the country, and I for one should be very sorry to give any influence I have to oppose appropriations that were necessary and proper to carry it on with all the other great appropriations in the bill. My whole reason for asking that the amendment remain as it is, is that from my knowledge of the work and my careful examination of the reports of the engineers which I have read over and studied carefully, I believe this sum will carry on the work sufficiently until another appropriation bill is passed in March. If it should not be passed then, or if the Government should stop making these appropriations, this work would have to share the fate of the rest. I say that in deference to the opinion of the Senator from Tennessee.

There have been on two occasions before this times when the work did not progress so as to use between the times when the appropriation bills were passed a good many thousand dollars of money appropriated; and if it is found that there is on hand when another bill comes up fifty or seventy-five or one hundred thousand dollars of money that has been appropriated and lies idle it can not fail to prejudice the next appropriation. We all have felt the effects of that. When a new bill has been presented and the report of the engineer is that there is a large amount that has not been expended, then it is almost aways cut down below what it ought to be. It injures the bill. I say that because I have known cases of that kind, where it has been urged against an appropriation that more money had been appropriated than had been properly expended or expended at all during the preceding year, from whatever cause it might have arisen.

Now, in my judgment, at the rate this work has been going on, although the money has been all expended, the amount allowed by the committee is enough. Senators must remember that it is two years since the last appropriation bill, and the last appropriation bill provided about what the House has provided this year. Therefore it has had two years to run out in; but I venture my judgment, with perhaps more care given to it than is usual among Senators, that $250,000, the amount proposed by the committee here, is all that can be expended between now and the time when we may reasonably expect another appropriation.

I make these remarks not that I wish to oppose any appropriation for such a work as this, especially for a work of the magnitude which I consider this to be and of the great benefit that I have no doubt it will give to the people of a region not as accessible as many more level parts of the country by other means of communication, by railroads and other modes of transportation. The reasons I have stated were controlling with me in thinking this was about the proper appropriation; and if my views are correct about it, I think the work will be in a better condition if we leave it as it is now and have the money expended than it would be on the 3rd of March next or next February, when we consider the appropriation bill, to find that there were fifty or sixty or one hundred thousand dollars appropriated that had not been used.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will not detain the Senate. The only reason for making this change in the appropriation has been substantially stated by the Senator from Michigan, and it goes on the question of the amount which should be appropriated annually for this improvement. There is no doubt about the merits of the work and the benefit of the work when completed. This amount as recommended by the committee is the same amount appropriated in the last river and harbor bill, and would be the whole amount to be appropriated annually.

Mr. PUGH. I am glad to hear the Senator from Michigan state that this improvement is as important as any that is to be made in the Southern States and will result in as much benefit. The engineer in charge of the work states that he can expend the $350,000 the present year. Seven hundred thousand dollars is the estimate for the completion of the work next year.

Mr. McMILLAN. Seven hundred thousand dollars is the amount that can be expended profitably this year, he thinks.

Mr. PUGH. No, sir, I beg pardon; the engineer's estimate is $700,000 for completing the river and opening it to permanent navigation.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not know what is the statement in the report of the engineer. The amount that can be profitably expended for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, is stated to be $700,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Allow me. The engineer in charge, Mr. King, states that $700,000 will complete the work if $350,000 is given this year and $350,000 next year.

Mr. PUGH. The work has been suspended for many months on account of the failure of the appropriation last March. If we get this appropriation of $350,000, it insures the completion of the work next year, with a similar appropriation then. That subject has been fully considered, as I understand, by the House committee. There was a large delegation of gentlemen well informed in relation to this improvement, and upon their representations this appropriation was made by the House committee without a dissenting voice. I hope that our committee and the Senate will allow the House appropriation to stand. It can work no injury. If the money is not expended it will be in the Treasury, but I am satisfied that it can all be expended before the next appropriation is made.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think perhaps the statement of the Senator from Tennessee should be qualified somewhat or else the engineer has made a mistake in his statement and it is inconsistent with the report. The amount estimated for the completion of the existing project, that is, the improvement of the Tennessee River below Chattanooga, $1,787,500; the amount that can be profitably expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, is stated to be $700,000. Now, it may be that the engineer is of opinion that a great portion of the improvement of the river below Chattanooga may be finished with the $700,000 of which he speaks, but not the project to which the report of the engineer refers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, in line 671.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 675 of section 1, to reduce the appropriation for "improving Kentucky River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement" from $250,000 to $175,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment of the committee for reasons which I will attempt to give.

Kentucky has not been in the habit of getting much in the way of appropriations for river and harbor improvements. I recollect about the time I took my seat in the Senate that upon examination it was found that in all the time past she had received less than $100 in appropriations from the General Government for works of internal improvement. In 1836 I found the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that Kentucky had never received a single dollar from the Treasury for fortifications, for harbors, for light-houses, for rivers, or any other work of internal improvement whatever, and down to the present day she has received but $475,000 all told.

Now, why shall she be cut down? The first estimate of the engineer was $380,000 for this work. The second estimate is $100,000 more, making $480,000, which the House upon some principle of a percentage has reduced to $250,000, and the Senate Committee on Commerce has made a further reduction of $75,000. What justice is there in that?

What is this appropriation for? It is to slack-water the Kentucky River, and it takes $200,000 to build a single lock and dam, and the appropriation of the Senate committee is only $175,000, less than is necessary to build one single lock. We must build a lock every summer, and here the Senate committee has cut this appropriation down to an amount less than the estimate of the engineer to build a single lock.

It is well known to the Senate that I have always been liberal upon these questions. I believe in a considerate system of internal improvement by the General Government, and believe that its power extends to wherever the admiralty jurisdiction of our courts extends. I believe that money expended in this way is the best way Congress can expend it. It is distributed among the people; it gives employment to laborers; it gives a market for material; it leaves permanent, beneficial work in the country, and above all it gives a rival to the rapacity of the railroads in charging freights to the farmers and merchants of the country.

I want to read in this connection a letter from the engineer in charge. It is short and plain. It is addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE, No. 82 WEST THIRD STREET,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 19, 1884.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt, yesterday, of your letter of the 15th instant, in regard to the improvement of the Kentucky River.

You ask the following questions:

First. What were the expenses of operating the Kentucky River improvement during the past fiscal year, and about what will they be during the present and next fiscal year?

Second. What is the estimated cost of lock and draw No. 6?

Third. Have you any commercial statistics additional to those given in last annual report?

Fourth. What is the estimated cost of locks 7, 8, &c.?

In reply to the first question, I have to state that the cost of maintaining slack-water navigation upon the river as far as the locks and dams are in operation, or for a distance of eighty-two miles from its mouth, or sixteen miles above Frankfort, Ky., is $8,000 per year, as follows:

Eight lock-keepers, two at each lock, $380 per month	$4,560 00
Watchman at No. 5, $15 per month	180 00
Superintendent of navigation, $90 per month	1,080 00
Fuel and lights	180 00
Necessary current repairs to locks and dams	2,000 00
	8,000 00

The money available for the payment of these current expenses will probably be exhausted soon after July 1, next, at which time, in the absence of some provision for paying them, navigation upon the river will have to be suspended.

Five locks are already completed, or rather already repaired, they having been built years ago by the State of Kentucky, and when the National Government took charge of this improvement these were turned over to it and the dams were repaired. The locks are in an excellent state of preservation, and navigation exisits above Frankfort, and numerous boats are plying below upon the river.

In the general estimate, quoted in your letter from my report, the twelve new locks and dams to be built were averaged to cost $200,000 each.

And here is $175,000 only allowed to keep in repair all the locks already built and build new ones.

Some of these on account of favorable locations may cost somewhat less, while others, again, will cost more. Considering the contingencies and difficulties, which can not be definitely ascertained beforehand, I have thought it safe to estimate them all at $200,000 each. No. 6 is one of those which will cost fully this amount.

That is the next one to be built this summer.

In my opinion its construction should be completed at once.

The following is the detailed estimate upon which I based the amount of $380,000 asked for in my annual report for the next fiscal year, and shows the work it is proposed to do during that year:

Repairs to lock and dam No. 5	$112,020 00
Repairs to four locks and dams in operation, protecting banks, constructing lock-houses, and current running expenses	48,294 76
Lock and dam No. 6	200,000 00
Additional amount needed for dam at Beattyville	19,685 24
	380,000 00

That is the estimate of what is indispensable to the continuance of the work, and to the preservation of that which has already been completed.

It was thought the balance of the repairs estimated for in the report to be made upon the four locks and dams might be delayed another year.

When the annual report was submitted I had been in charge of the work but little more than a month, and hence subsequent study has developed several points which should have been explained. In this connection I will refer to the fact of the advantage to be gained by constructing two of the new locks at once. By building two together not only is much time saved but more advantageous contracts can be made and many items of expense can be cut off.

I stated in my report that only $380,000 could be profitably expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. I am now prepared to state that had I added another $100,000 for the commencement of lock No. 7, it would have enabled a saving of a whole year in the extension of the slack-water navigation upon the river and rendered the work much more economical. If it is possible yet to add this amount to that stated in my report in the consideration in your committee of the amount to be given to the Kentucky River for the next fiscal year, I trust it will be done. It would be a profitable expenditure, and should if possible be granted in addition to the amount already asked for.

I have been gathering together additional statistics of the river commerce, but they are not in such a form as can be conveniently used at present, and it may take some days to arrange them. I will not delay this letter until they are prepared, but will send them as soon as ready. Enough is seen from their inspection and the development of new business along the river to convince me that the river commerce is materially increasing. It might be noted that in my report a typographical error places the amount of saw-logs at 6,000,000 feet B. M. This should be 60,000,000 feet B. M.; market value, $500,000.

The estimate of the cost of locks and dams Nos. 7, 8, &c., is $200,000 each.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAS. C. POST, Captain of Engineers.

Hon. ALBERT S. WILLIS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to know what reason there is for this reduction? I think this bill as it came from the House is a moderate and a reasonable one, and the amount appropriated is very low for such great purposes. It is two years since we have had a river and harbor bill. That bill of $18,000,000 appropriated two years ago, which was called a bill of abominations, in my judgment was the best bill Congress ever passed. There were some items in it that were not items of merit; but why shall we reject a great measure on that account?

The Senate committee has added very little to this House bill, a little over $1,000,000. It has increased some and it has reduced other items from the amounts named in the House bill. I have a list here of the States that have been reduced and the States that have been increased. I make no objection, gentlemen of the committee, to your increasing the appropriations for your States. The States which have been increased are Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, and Vermont, all Republican States.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There are others.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The report of the committee——

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has a very imperfect list of the States increased, if that is the one he gives us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The one I got was the report of yesterday. There is a further increase to Alabama, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, and Virginia. It happens that there are six Southern and Democratic States increased. There are nineteen States in which the Senate Committee on Commerce have increased the appropriations over and above the House bill, and then there are the States of Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Delaware which have been reduced. I do not object to the committee increasing the appropriations, but do it fairly out of the Treasury and do not take it from us to put it upon your States, gentlemen.

There is a singular thing, too, about this, that the Democratic States which have not been reduced are the States that have upon the committee members of the Senate—from Maryland, North Carolina, Texas, and Virginia; no, Virginia has two Republican Senators, but she has no member on that committee. This was put in I suppose to help readjustment. I do not blame these members of the committee for saving their States, but in the name of God do not ruin us; do not increase your own appropriations by taking from us who have no voice on that committee. Put back the appropriations for the House bill and keep those that you have got, and I shall not object. The State of Texas, the State of North Carolina, and the State of Maryland were exceedingly fortunate in having such able representatives upon that committee as could increase their appropriations. Maryland is increased $70,000; North Carolina, $180,000; Texas, $82,000; Virginia, $40,000, while Arkansas is reduced $94,000; Georgia, $60,000, and Kentucky, $250,000. Kentucky is reduced nearly one-fourth of all that you take off. What has she done, what have I done or either of her Senators here to merit such punishment from the committee?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator should remember that the State of Kentucky was so well represented in regard to this bill elsewhere that perhaps the State of Kentucky got all she was entitled to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The State of Kentucky has got less than $250,000 in the whole bill. You do not call the Ohio Falls Kentucky. The Ohio Falls are merely a part of the Ohio River, which belongs to the whole country. That belongs to all the States above it and all the States below it; to all the States everywhere that have any commercial intercourse upon that river. It is a great national river, upon whose bosom floats more commerce in value than goes from every port of this country to the foreign countries of the world. The value of the tonnage on the Ohio River is greater than all the foreign commerce of the United States. Is it fair to charge Kentucky with that?

The commerce on the Ohio is greater than all the foreign commerce of this country. Take its iron, timber, cattle, hogs, and wheat; its lumber, its millions and thousand of millions of various products. Six thousand steamboats pass annually through that canal at Louisville. The committee struck that down from $300,000 to $50,000. That will never do in this world. Pennsylvania will not stand it; West Virginia will not stand it; Ohio will not stand it; Illinois, Kentucky, Indiana, Missouri, none of the States South will stand that reduction. It is not to Louisville that that canal is of any advantage. Louisville grew up because there was an obstruction in the river there, and the removal of that obstruction by digging the canal is a matter that interests all the States above and below, and indeed all this country is interested in the navigation of that great river, second only in importance to the Mississippi in this whole country. There is more commerce upon it than upon any other river in the Union except the Mississippi; and yet $50,000 is appropriated to widen and deepen it. The commerce of half this New World of ours goes through that gate at Louisville.

Now, in relation to the next amendment, which I shall move to disagree to when we reach it—and I may as well discuss both at this time—I want to read you what a most intelligent gentleman of Louisville, W. W. Hite, president of the Louisville and Evansville Mail Company, says:

OFFICE OF LOUISVILLE AND EVANSVILLE MAIL COMPANY,
Louisville, Ky., March 18, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: As requested in your favor of the 14th instant, I have prepared a memorandum of accidents on the Falls of the Ohio for the past few years. The dates I have taken from the books of the inspector of hulls and the records of the life-saving station. I inclose two clippings and will send scrap-book of Capt. Wm. Devan to-morrow, which contains a good many more. In talking to Captain Devan he tells me he expects to be in Washington in about a week, when he will call and see you and give you any information he may have. He is well posted about the falls. When you are through with Captain Devan's book—

Captain Devan has charge of the life-saving station there I think—

please return it to me by express. I shall be glad to aid you in any way in my power.

With kind regards, yours truly,

W. W. HITE.

Hon. ALBERT S. WILLIS,
Washington, D. C.

Captain Hite gives a list here of eighteen splendid passenger steamboats that have been wrecked at the head of the canal for the want of the very improvement which General Weitzel and Colonel Merrill have recommended should be made:

Senators all understand that the falls are between Louisville and Jeffersonville. The canal is on the Louisville side, and what is called the Indiana chute is on the opposite side, and there is between what they call the middle chute. The Government since the war, in order to improve the navigation of the river, built a wing-dam for the purpose of throwing the water into the Indiana chute to make it navigable. It furnished more water, but it made the current so rapid that it could not be navigated, and it threw the water with great violence into the mouth of the canal and against a dike constructed to conduct boats; and the improvement proposed here by the engineer is to tear out that dam, widen it, and make a basin or harbor which will be adequate to all the demands of commerce, and the estimate for that is $1,000,000, and this committee has given $50,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Not for that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. For the work proposed by General Weitzel. The estimate proposed here was not so large. I have the report in my hand of Colonel Merrill, appendix 2, a special report on the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio River. I send it to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper sent up by the Senator will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SPECIAL REPORT ON IMPROVEMENT OF THE FALLS OF THE OHIO RIVER.

In January, 1882, the Senate of the United States called for a special report on the improvements still needed at the Falls of the Ohio to serve the interests of the commerce of the Ohio River. This report was made under date of February 10, 1882, by Major (now Lieutenant-Colonel) Weitzel, and is printed in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, 1882, page 1880 et seq.

As Colonel Weitzel's successor, it has devolved upon me to take up the subject where he left it, and to carry it on with such additions and improvements as further experience and study might suggest.

The chief improvement which he recommends is an independent coal canal, in order to prevent the stoppage of other kinds of traffic when a coal run arrives at Louisville.

Such a canal would be an excellent solution of the difficulties that now embarrass navigation, but I am reluctantly compelled to report that, in my judgment, it is not practicable at the present. The insurmountable obstacle is the fact that its construction would wholly destroy the immense cement interest of Louisville, that would thus be deprived of access to its quarries.

The cement mills and quarries could doubtless be condemned and purchased, but the condemnation price would be more than the project could bear, even if the injury to the interest of the public by the extinguishment of so important an industry were left out of consideration.

I therefore feel compelled to submit, in lieu of the independent coal canal, a project for as great an enlargement of the upper half of the canal as can be made without interfering with the cement interests. Whenever, as will happen in the course of time, the cement rock is worked out and the quarries are abandoned, it will be practicable to complete Colonel Weitzel's plan at a great saving over his present figures, as all of the costly rock excavation for which he has estimated will be done by the cement companies in their pursuit of cement rock.

The project which I therefore submit, as the best now attainable, will give great relief to the canal, and will be an inestimable boon to the city of Louisville by furnishing ample harbor room, and by greatly lessening the annoyance from mud, ice, and drift. It contemplates enlarging the present canal by moving its northern wall to the northern line of the canal property, commencing at the pivot pier of the railroad bridge and extending easterly to the intersection with the eastern boundary line of the property of the Louisville Cement Company. At this point will be the new head of the canal, and it will be connected with the existing dam on the crest of the falls by a similar dam along the eastern line of the cement company's property to its northeastern corner, thence by a straight line to the southern end of the opening for the Middle Chute. The accompanying map shows the proposed enlargement and its relations to the existing canal. The most expensive part of this and all other plans for the enlargement of the head of the canal is the necessity of excavating to canal bottom the rocky ledge that forms the falls, which has to be lowered from three to four feet.

The estimated cost of the modification herein recommended is as follows:

Rock excavation	$1,089,411
Earth excavation	84,650
Removing canal wall	15,196
Removing river wall	15,288
New retaining-wall	47,400
Removing part of dam	4,230
2,600 feet of new dam	15,600
Contingencies, 5 per cent	63,588
Total	1,335,363

As the estimate for the independent coal canal was $3,102,517, the adoption of the proposed modification will cause a present saving of $1,767,154, with the advantage that everything done under this project will fit into the larger project whenever the time comes for its execution.

The present entrance into the canal is contracted and dangerous. The head of the guiding dike is now ornamented with the wreck of a fine passenger steamboat, the Buckeye State, that got caught while trying to land at the Louisville wharf. The proposed improvement would make the harbor of Louisville as safe as any on the Ohio River, and at the same time it would make the canal accessible at all stages without danger or difficulty.

As the work should be done as soon as possible, I would recommend an appropriation of $500,000 for "enlarging Louisville and Portland Canal."

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senate have heard what the engineer has to say, and that $500,000 the committee has reduced to $50,000. It is doubtless understood by the Senate that the Louisville Canal was originally built and owned by a private company chartered by the Legislature of Kentucky. The original cost and the improvements they put upon it amounted to $2,965,403. It was a toll canal while it belonged to a private company, and it collected during its existence off the commerce of the West $6,000,000 in the way of tolls, until the people interested in the navigation of that river rose and demanded of the Government of the United States that it should purchase and make it free to all boats up and down that river. The Government of the United States did buy it. It paid for it a total cost of $2,600,000, a sum less by $3,400,000 than the tolls which had been collected off the commerce of the West upon that river, which amount stands to-day in the nature of a credit to the commerce of the people of the West, and yet the committee give to this great improvement, so earnestly demanded by the engineer and the whole people of the Ohio Valley, only $50,000 to widen that canal, when the report shows and when the facts show that the mouth of that canal is strewn with wrecks of steamers, when the facts are that more that two hundred and fifty lives have within the last two years been saved by our life-saving station there from the wrecks of boats, and yet the Senate of the United States hesitates to adopt the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will refuse to concur in both the amendments as to the Kentucky River and as to the Ohio Falls. Why, sir, Kentucky, with her wealth and her commercial interests, gets in this whole bill only about $207,000. She has more navigable river front than any State in this whole Union. She has upon her northern border, for seven or eight hundred miles, the Ohio River; she has upon her east three hundred and fifty miles of the Big Sandy; she has the Kentucky; she has the Licking; she has Green River; she has Red River; the Cumberland and the Tennessee flow through her, and the Mississippi on the west; Salt River is only navigable for defeated candidates; it is navigable up stream, never down. [Laughter.] Think of it; $207,000 only appropriated for a great State that pays nearly $20,000,000 in internal revenue annually; that has received from the foundation of the Government for internal improvements only $475,000, and is watered and washed by such a multiplicity of navigable streams.

That great river, the Tennessee, and the Cumberland run across the State of Kentucky. The Cumberland rises in the extreme southeastern county of the State, runs out south into Tennessee like my elbow [illustrating], and unites Tennessee and Kentucky, and holds them together as twin sisters, and she pours her placid waters into the Ohio on the Kentucky shore. The Tennessee is the same, navigable for 1,200 miles, rising in Virginia and upon the borders of Kentucky she courses south and takes in Alabama and Tennessee and comes back into Kentucky, hugging them all in the close embrace of sisters; and yet Kentucky gets but $207,000.

What is going to become of the locks you have already started? You do not propose to give Kentucky enough to build one lock. We shall never get that river improved if that is the course the Congress of the United States is going to take.

I say to these gentlemen put these amounts back; disagree to the amendments of the committee and let the bill stand as it came from the House. That will satisfy me. Keep the amendments you put on for yourselves. I do not object to that. I think the bill is rather a meager one at best. I should prefer to have it more liberal than it is. I would like it better if it was more liberal. I am not finding fault with you gentlemen on the committee who have saved your own States and increased them.

Mr. SLATER. The Senator seems to address me. I am not on the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought you belonged to it. Oregon has somebody on it. I have the list of committees here.

Mr. HARRIS. California represents the Pacific coast on the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will read the names of the committee. I venture to say that no State with a Senator on the committee has suffered, but most of them have been increased; increased not by a fair, open appropriation from the Treasury, but by taking from Kentucky, from Arkansas, from Georgia, from Mississippi, from Tennessee, and other States. Here is the committee: Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. JONES of Nevada, Mr. CONGER, Mr. FRYE, Mr. MILLER of New York, Mr. DOLPH, Mr. RANSOM, Mr. COKE, Mr. SLATER, Mr. VEST, and Mr. GORMAN.

Mr. SLATER. Will the Senator allow me a moment? That is an old committee-list printed while I was a member of it, but some time since I was excused and withdrew from service upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I knew the way Oregon had gone on in regard to appropriations in the bill that she must have had some committeeman on it. I find that there is one large appropriation, a new matter, that for the mouth of Columbia River. That is a new item put on which will involve an expenditure of from two to five million dollars. I do not object to it, understand; I am for every increase you have made; I want you to have them; but let us have ours as the House sent the bill to us.

We are told that a man who will not provide for his own household is worse than an infidel.

Mr. VEST. I understood the Senator from Kentucky to state that every committeeman had secured increased appropriations for his State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I did not say so.

Mr. VEST. There is no increase in my State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; there is no increase in Missouri or California, but in all the other States I mentioned there is.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. How about Nevada?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You have no rivers or you would have had an increase. [Laughter.] I have no doubt that every increase is for a meritorious purpose; I do not object to it; but I object to the amounts being taken from my State and put on somebody else's. I hope that gentlemen will every one vote against the committee amendments and remand us exactly to the position in which the House bill put us.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senate has been in continuous session now since 11 o'clock, and evidently the Senators are exhausted. I shall not ask the Senate to remain longer in session, but I wish before closing to ask the President of the Senate if the resolution adopted a day or two since limiting debate to five minutes does not apply to this bill?

Mr. FRYE. It was only a resolution making a motion to limit debate in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I submit that motion now.

Mr. INGALLS. Do it on Monday morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota, under the resolution, is at liberty to move to limit debate to five minutes.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the use of moving it now if the Senate is about to adjourn?

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair permit the resolution to be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That during the remainder of the present session of the Senate it shall be in order to move at any time that debate on any amendment, or all amendments, to any appropriation bill then before the Senate be limited to five minutes for each Senator, and that no Senator shall speak more than once on the same amendment in form or substance. The question on such motion shall be determined without debate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I withdraw the motion I made, and move instead that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and after eleven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 28, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. I understand that to-day has been set apart for consideration of bills in the interest of labor. Am I correct?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WELLER. Believing that interest to be of paramount importance as compared with all other questions, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the reception of privileged reports, if there are any.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations. I am instructed by that committee to report back the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, with amendments of the Senate, and to move that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1884.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I rise to make a privileged report. I present the report of a conference committee.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) making appropriations for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 4 and 5 strike out "314" and insert "300;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 6 strike out "fifty-six" and insert "seventy;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "162,500" and insert "200,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

A. M. SCALES,
WM. H. HATCH,
A. HERR SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOS. R. HAWLEY,
O. D. CONGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement accompanying the report was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution providing for printing the Agricultural Reports for 1884, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The joint resolution as agreed to by the conference committee provides for printing 400,000 copies of the Agricultural Report for 1884 300,000 copies being for the use of the House, 70,000 for the Senate, and 30,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture, and appropriate $200,000 for printing the same.

A. M. SCALES,
WM. H. HATCH,
A. HERR SMITH.
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move the adoption of the report; and upon that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GULF, COLORADO AND SANTA FÉ RAILROAD.

Mr. WELLBORN. I desire to submit a privileged resolution, to correct an error in a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House (the Senate concurring), That the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 3961) entitled "An act to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," be amended by inserting the figure "9" after the figure "7" in the following paragraph:

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered respectively 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and agree to the same," making said paragraph read as follows:

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered respectively 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9, and agree to the same."

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to know what makes this correction necessary.

Mr. WELLBORN. The situation is this: The conference committee on this bill agreed that the House should recede from its disagreement to seven of the Senate amendments. Through a clerical omission in drafting the report one of those amendments was not mentioned. The amendment referred to was one which required the railroad company to construct and maintain crossings and bridges wherever public roads cross the line of railroad. That was omitted through clerical inadvertence. This is designed to make the correction.

Mr. KEIFER. I had thought it referred to other matters.

The concurrent resolution was adopted.

Mr. WELLBORN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I call up as a privileged matter the message from the Senate relating to the bill (S. 838).

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the message from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 25, 1884.

Resolved, That the Senate non-concurs in the amendment made by the House of Representatives to Senate bill No. 838, to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes, and asks a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. LOGAN, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. MAXEY be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House Mr. ROSECRANS, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. CUTCHEON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLER. I now insist upon the regular order.

Mr. McCOID. I would like to call up from the Speaker's table a bill in relation to the increase of the number of judges in the Territory of Dakota, returned from the Senate with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. McCOID. Unanimous consent to take up and concur in the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It does. When the regular order is demanded the Chair can recognize only gentlemen who have privileged matters to bring before the House.

Mr. WELLER. I would be glad to accommodate my colleague [Mr. McCOID] and other gentlemen also, but I can not yield at this time.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER, in accordance with the statute, laid before the House the following; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1884 be printed, and that there be printed 11,000 extra copies, of which 3,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, and 500 for sale by the Public Printer under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the additional cost of publication and 10 per cent. thereto thereon added, the illustrations to be obtained by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BISBEE, indefinitely;

To Mr. JONES, of Alabama, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, indefinitely, from necessity.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DUNN asked and obtained unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of the claim of Sally G. Ford, widow of Richard T. Ford.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the matter of privilege coming over from the session of yesterday evening, upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does that take precedence of the special order?

The SPEAKER. It is a matter of privilege and unfinished business.

Mr. WELLER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] desires to obtain the attention of the House for a moment upon a question connected with the interest of education.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand for the regular order?

Mr. WELLER. I will for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not withdraw it conditionally.

Mr. WELLER. Then I will withdraw the demand for the regular order.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is entitled to the floor upon the question coming over from yesterday as unfinished business.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the House is too impatient to listen to any discussion about the matter that was brought in here yesterday. My impression is that the best thing we can do——

Mr. CANNON. There is so much confusion in the Hall that we can not hear what the gentleman from New York is saying.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not think very much harm comes from printing matters. I think the distinctive difference between civilization and barbarism is that civilized people print and barbarians do not. [Laughter.] My impression is that the best men in this House ought to indulge a little more in printing than they do. And the worst men are sure to be caught if they do print.

I have offered an amendment with reference to printing, as a speech of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BREWER], a book or a portion of a book published by Mr. Blaine, of Maine. It is not a very new thing to have books printed in the RECORD. We have had the opportunity, time and again in very many ways, to print matters in the RECORD at large. I remember that a member of Congress, or rather a Delegate from a Territory, on one occasion printed in the RECORD a poem already copyrighted; and the next morning after it was printed—on the 22d of April, 1880—Mr. Garfield, our dead President, then a member of this House, rose in his place here and asked, as a question of privilege, that this poem should be stricken out. Why? He said:

I rise to a question which I presume should be regarded as a question of privilege. I call the attention of the House to the RECORD of this morning, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report whether the first fifteen pages of to-day's publication shall go into the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I make this motion with the utmost respect for the gentleman [Mr. Downey] who has published in the RECORD the poem to which my motion refers. I suppose that members of the House are entirely at liberty to speak in verse or in prose, as they may choose; but I raise the question whether a gentleman has the right to file, under the privilege of printing a speech in the RECORD, a copyrighted book, which as appears from the heading here this is. It appears to be a poetical work which has been copyrighted, "all rights reserved;" and whether under the privilege granted by the House to print a speech on any given subject a man may file a manuscript copyrighted book and print it as a part of the permanent records of the House is a question worthy of consideration.

Mr. Garfield went on to say—

I think it important for us to know how far the privilege granted a Member or a Delegate to print remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD extends. I recollect that some years ago there came very near being printed, under this privilege to print, a British volume on some economical question, which it was proposed to publish entire in the records of this House so as to give it circulation. Of course it is possible that the privilege of the House may be abused by persons getting leave to print and publishing volumes which the House might have no desire to see printed.

It does seem, looking at this matter calmly, that we ought in some way or other to restrict this RECORD. I have been trying for years to have our RECORD reduced to the proportions of "Hansard." But we have to put in everything—matters belonging to the Journal, the Clerk's office, &c.—so we have all this overloading of our RECORD.

Now as to the political phase of this question. What does it mean? Somebody prints from the New York Star a little statement that Mr. LOGAN owns 80,000 acres of land. Nobody charges that he obtained the land wrongfully. Is there anything wrong about Mr. LOGAN'S accumulation of this land? If any member so thinks, let it be printed and, if necessary, let it be corrected. Why not? I do not know that General LOGAN is a dishonest man. Who does?

Mr. DUNHAM. He does not own the land and never did own it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then let that be stated, and it ends the matter. What is the object of this discussion here to-day except to prevent an adjournment. Let us all go to work and end this matter. [Cries of "That is right!"] I will move to lay the whole matter on the table.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And I will vote for it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] yield to the gentleman from New York for the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. MCADOO. I yielded five minutes to the gentleman from New York for debate. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes.

Mr. MCADOO. How much more time does the gentleman from New York desire?

Mr. COX, of New York. I am through with my remarks. If the gentleman from New Jersey will allow me, I make the motion to lay on the table. If he does not yield for that purpose I can not make it. But I think the great body of the House wants to go to business. [Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!" "Vote!" "Vote!" and "Regular order!"]

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a point of order. That it is not in order at this time to lay the pending resolution on the table; that the gentleman from New York has not the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair expressly inquired of the gentleman from New Jersey whether or not he yielded for that purpose. The gentleman from New Jersey, when upon the floor in his own right, might have made that motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the other side of the House wish to talk on this subject after their experience of yesterday, I would suggest to the gentleman from New York they be allowed to proceed.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think, Mr. Speaker, the best way is to end this business and see if we can not work for an early adjournment, and therefore I will not withdraw the motion that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair never recognized any other gentleman upon the floor to move to lay upon the table than the member in charge of a measure or resolution before the House, of course the motion never could be made. It is a motion which always comes from the opponents of a pending proposition. It is a privileged motion, and the Chair understands the gentleman from New Jersey yields to the gentleman from New York for the purpose of submitting that motion.

Mr. WELLER. Let us go to a work which is of some importance to the country; and I hope there will be no delay in proceeding to the consideration of the business on the subject of labor and laborers, set down for this day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to ascertain whether the gentleman from New Jersey has yielded to the gentleman from New York to make the motion to lay upon the table. [After a pause.] Will the gentleman from New Jersey respond?

Mr. MCADOO. I did yield for that purpose to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say again, Mr. Speaker, that as I understand the usage of this House the member submitting a resolution or having charge of a bill or other measure is generally permitted to have the control of its disposition. Therefore I do not understand, pending the discussion of this resolution and before the expiration even of the hour of the member submitting it, any member of the other side can get up and cut off all further discussion on the subject by moving to lay the resolution on the table, thus depriving of the opportunity of reply to the remarks in opposition to the resolution on the other side on the part of the member who moved the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It may be unusual to do so, but still the motion to lay on the table is one which never comes from the member in charge of a measure. It is a hostile proceeding, and once made by a member entitled to the floor the Chair is bound to entertain it.

Mr. CANNON rose. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CANNON. I am entitled to the floor for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Certainly, and the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I will not trespass on the patience of the House or exceed my rights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. CANNON. I have never yet in my experience in this House heard of a like motion to lay upon the table a pending resolution before the mover of the resolution had occupied the time which under the rules was allotted to him. Whether there be anything in the rule or not allowing such a course to be taken on the part of the other side, I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that the unbroken precedents of parliamentary procedure in this House are against it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent this day has been set down for the consideration of two bills coming from the Committee on Labor. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] will indicate to the Chair which bill he proposes to take up at this time.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6541) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law, and pending that motion I move that all general debate be closed in two hours.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understand the bill about to be read has been set down for to-day under the special order. If I understand correctly the ruling of the Chair heretofore, it is in order to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill referred to is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; when it is reached in that committee its consideration may be objected to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. May I not raise the question of consideration now?

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the House. The question of consideration is necessarily involved in the motion the gentleman makes, for if the House does not wish to proceed to the consideration of the bill it will vote down the motion to go into committee.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will be pardoned for not knowing much about the rules of the House. I desire to inquire now whether I may not move that the House proceed to the consideration of the bills on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Not to-day, the Chair thinks, unless this business is first disposed of in some way.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am quite astonished at this new-born zeal on the part of the gentleman from Indiana in behalf of the Mexican pension bill. He showed no such fervor in behalf of the old Mexican soldiers when the bill was before the House for consideration.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object to the motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table, for in that way we will be able to reach the educational bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to see the bill in favor of the Mexican pensioners in the hands of its friends and not in the hands of its enemies.

The SPEAKER. Until the House disposes in some way of the order heretofore made it must be proceeded with.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to vacate that order for the purpose I have suggested.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is a motion already pending to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending, and it will be submitted to the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will it be in order to go to business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the Mexican pension bill?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have always been ready, Mr. Speaker, to take up and consider the Mexican pension bill as it now stands on the Speaker's table amended by the Senate. I have always been in favor of it as it now is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is the first time I have known the gentleman to exhibit such active zeal on this subject, and we understand exactly what it means.

Mr. WELLER. I hope the House will do nothing to antagonize the consideration of the bills coming from the Committee on Labor which have been set down as the special order for to-day.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. If it be proper I should like to ask unanimous consent to present a petition.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HORR. I rise to a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state what it is.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HORR, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask now to present the views of the minority, accompanied by a substitute for the bill reported by the committee. There is one member out of the seven who has not yet signed these minority views, and I ask consent that he may have that privilege, to which I imagine the gentleman from Michigan will not object.

Mr. HORR. Certainly not.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask also that the report be printed with the report of the committee, and that the substitute recommended may also be printed in the usual form and number of bills, and referred with the report of the committee to the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to offer the substitute now, and let it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with the majority report?

Mr. RANDALL. I do; and that the usual number of the reports accompanying the substitute be also printed, so that each member of the House may have an opportunity of examining both recommendations.

There being no objection, the views of the minority were ordered to be printed, to accompany the report of the committee; and it was further ordered that the substitute bill be printed in the same manner.

Mr. HORR. I desire to give notice that I shall call this bill up on Monday next immediately after the morning hour, unless the morning hour shall be dispensed with, and press it to its passage.

Mr. STORM. It is understood that all points of order are reserved on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Points of order will be reserved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to proceed with the special order.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 6541) relating to the eight-hour law.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6541) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whoever, as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, has been employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States since the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work, shall be paid for each eight hours he has been employed as for a full day's work, at the price per day as regulated by private parties in the vicinity in which the work was performed, without reference to the number of hours' work required by such parties.

SEC. 2. That all claims for labor so performed in excess of eight hours per day are hereby referred to the Court of Claims, to be adjudicated upon the basis that eight hours constitute a day's work, and are to be paid for at the price per day as provided for in the first section of this act, and judgment given against the United States in favor of each claimant for the amount found due, to be paid as other judgments of the Court of Claims against the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], who reported the bill.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of this proposition it may be well to advert hastily to the earlier efforts in securing legislation upon this subject. The first bill for a national eight-hour law was introduced in the Thirty-ninth Congress, House of Representatives, by Mr. Rogers, of New Jersey, February 19, 1866, and in substance provided that eight hours constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, or mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States. It was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. March 1 of the same session Mr. Niblack, of Indiana, House of Representatives, introduced by unanimous consent a joint resolution to the same effect, which was also referred to the same committee. In the United States Senate, March 5, 1866, Senator Brown, of Missouri, introduced by unanimous consent a bill making eight hours a legal day's work for laborers, mechanics, and artisans of the Government; and in the House, March 12, 1866, Mr. Julian offered a similar bill, while upon April 16 Mr. Ingersoll, of Illinois, offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is one of the paramount duties of all legislative bodies to lighten as much as possible the burdens of the laboring classes and promote the general welfare: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law the eight-hour system, as it is called, as constituting a day's work in the District of Columbia; and that the said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

This resolution was agreed to, and went to the Committee on District of Columbia.

In this Congress no definite action seems to have been taken upon any of these bills or resolutions; they appear to have died on the dockets of the committees to whom they had been referred.

Mr. Banks, of Massachusetts, March 28, 1867, introduced the identical bill which eventually became a law, and which is now commonly and familiarly known as the eight-hour law, and under which arises the questions presented in the bill now under consideration by the House. The bill passed the House under a suspension of the rule and went across to the Senate the same day, where it was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, where it died or was forgotten.

In the Fortieth Congress, second session, January 6, 1868, Mr. Banks, of Massachusetts, again in the House of Representatives introduced the same bill which was introduced by him in the Thirty-ninth Congress. This bill, then known as House bill 365, passed under a suspension of the rules and went to the Senate. In that body upon the following day, January 7, the bill was received from the House and was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and appropriately referred. On the 24th of June, 1868, the bill was taken up for consideration, and during the debate upon its passage a discussion ensued, which, if any member of the House having doubts as to what was meant will only take the trouble to read, I will venture the assertion, if he is fair-minded and unprejudiced in his decision, he will concede that the Senate clearly intended that no reduction of wages should follow a reduction of the hours of labor. This is clearly shown by the rejection of the amendment then offered by Senator SHERMAN, which was as follows:

And unless otherwise provided by law, the rate of wages paid by the United States shall be the current rate for the same labor for the same time at the place of employment.

In the debate on this amendment, Senator Conness said:

I hope this amendment will not be adopted. * * * The passage of this bill with this amendment would amount to nothing. * * * It would simply be a reduction of two hours' labor.

Senator SHERMAN said, in support of his amendment:

All I desire is, if the United States Government chooses to take the lead in making eight hours a day's work, that it shall not be compelled to pay for that eight hours' work more than any private individual would pay. * * * I have no objection to the bill with this amendment, for then the same amount of work done for the United States will bear the same price as if done for an individual, no more and no less.

Senator Morton said:

As I understood the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, I am not in favor of it. I think it will virtually defeat the object of this bill.

To which Mr. Conness said: "Of course it will." Mr. Morton, resuming, said:

It proposes to adjust the rate of wages according to the length of time during which labor is performed. The effect of it would be to bring down the rate of wages, because the time for labor is shortened that much.

Upon the question that this law was to be an experiment, to determine whether as much work could be performed in eight hours as in ten, Mr. Morton said:

It can not be settled and the experiment can not be made if the wages in the very beginning are reduced 20 per cent., which would be the practical effect of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, because, as I understand his amendment, it proposes that the wages shall be reduced as the hours are in point of time.

Said Senator Stewart:

The amendment of the Senator from Ohio certainly on no theory would be right, and I think on a moment's reflection the Senator himself will see that, because I believe it is admitted on all sides that men will do more work per hour if they work eight hours than they will if they work ten hours in a day. If not admitted, I think it is a self-evident proposition. I think it is one of those axioms that require very little demonstration. I say a man will do more per hour who is only required to work eight hours per day than will a man who is required to work ten hours. The less number of hours a man works the more he can do in the hours he does work. That, I believe, will be taken as true. This being so, it would not be fair to say that when we reduce the number of hours' work from ten hours to eight hours per day the wages shall be reduced pro rata. Certainly if a man only works a single hour a day he can do more in that hour—make greater exertions—than if he had to work every hour of the day. So to adjust the wages pro rata according to the number of hours would not be fair.

On this question Mr. Wilson said:

In this matter of manual labor I look only to the rights and interests of labor. In this country and in this age, as in other countries and in other ages, capital needs no champion. It will take care of itself, and will secure, if not the lion's share, at least its full share of profits in all departments of industry. * * * Whatever tends to dignify manual labor or to lighten its burdens, to increase its rewards, or enlarge its knowledge, should receive our sympathies and command our support. Animated by these sentiments I shall vote against the amendment and for the bill as it came from the representatives of the people.

Said Senator Buckalew:

The operation of his (SHERMAN'S) amendment, therefore, when it comes to be applied practically, may be found to nullify the proposed law or to embarrass the Government in the transaction of public business. * * * Upon these considerations in my judgment it is perfectly clear that if we pass this bill at all we ought not to encumber and embarrass it with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment of Senator SHERMAN was rejected, and the bill passed the Senate as it came from the House—yeas 26, nays 11; and still the officers of the Government which enacted this law have enforced it ever since as if this amendment was a part of that law.

When the bill passed the Senate Senator SHERMAN moved to amend so that the title of the bill be changed to make it read:

A bill to pay Government employés 25 per cent. more wages than employés in private establishments receive.

Which plainly showed what he thought at that time of the intent and scope of the bill so far as the question of a reduction of wages went; and to his credit be it said that while Secretary of the Treasury he enforced the law, though an attempt to violate it was made by the Director of the Philadelphia Mint. After the passage of the law it early became apparent that Army and naval officers in command of military stations, where laborers, mechanics, and workmen were employed, were hostile to the spirit and intent of the law and determined to construe its provisions to suit themselves and compel or induce, through fear of discharge, workmen to labor ten hours per day or submit to a reduction of wages if only eight hours' labor was given. An appeal was taken to the President, but at that time nothing definite was obtained, and a petition was presented to Congress, which resulted in the passage by the House of what was then known as the Stevens declaratory resolution.

In first session of the Forty-first Congress, in the House of Representatives, Monday, April 5, 1869, Mr. Stevens, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent introduced a declaratory resolution. (H. R. No. 72.)

House of Representatives, Thursday, April 8, 1869, Mr. Stevens, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Naval Affairs, with a substitute, House joint resolution giving construction to the resolution of Congress approved June 25, 1868, relating to the hours of labor of certain Government employés. (H. R. No. 72.)

The substitute, which was read, provides "that the joint resolution reducing and regulating the hours of labor of Government laborers, workmen, and mechanics, approved June 25, 1868, shall not be construed as to authorize a corresponding reduction of wages."

The substitute was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed.

Here, then, within ten months from its passage, is a clear construction by the House as to what it intended by the act of June 25, 1868, and in language unmistakable it proclaimed its understanding of the same, which was that wages should not be reduced to correspond to the reduction in the hours of labor.

April 20, 1869, fifteen days after the passage of this resolution, Senator Wilson addressed a letter to the then Secretary of War, wherein he said:

I am clearly of the opinion that the construction put by officers of the Government upon the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by the United States is a palpable violation of the spirit and letter of the acts and of the intention of Congress, and of the men who petitioned for its passage.

The recent act of the House of Representatives is the complete demonstration that the action of the Government officials is in direct violation of the will of the representatives of the people. * * * Congress was not asked to reduce the pay in proportion to the reduction of the hours, but to fix the number of hours that should make a day's work. * * * By that law eight hours is constituted a day's work, a day's work that commands a day's pay.

The Stevens resolution went to the Senate, where it remained until the second session of the Forty-first Congress. In the mean time President Grant had been appealed to and had issued his first proclamation of May 19, 1869, giving for a first time the executive construction to the law, which was that no reduction in wages should be had because of a reduction of the hours of labor. When the Stevens resolution came up in the Senate no final action was taken, because it was presumed that the proclamation of President Grant had settled the matter and that the law from that time forward would be respected and enforced. At that time Senator Wilson said in the Senate:

I desire now, however, simply to say that at the last session of Congress, in its closing hours, I pressed action on this joint resolution, and mainly and chiefly upon this reason: We had passed the eight-hour act in the summer of 1868, but the construction that was put upon it by the Departments placed Congress, in my judgment, in a false position. I desire to correct that and to try this experiment fairly and honestly, and not stand before the country as we should by the construction of the Departments, as simply demagogues upon this question. We failed to pass the joint resolution the last session, and the President of the United States, by his construction, I think, relieved Congress, and I am under the greatest obligation to him for it. There is no special hurry to act upon this joint resolution, and I propose to let it pass over, as we have other pressing questions.

At that time it will be seen everybody thought that the proclamation of the President putting the executive construction upon the law would for all time, or until the law was repealed, be respected. There was no great pressing need of the passage of the resolution, consequently no action was taken by the Senate upon it, but which, time has proved, was an unfortunate omission.

But it seems that the officers of the Government cared no more for the proclamation of the President and paid it no more respect than they had the law itself; and so willful and flagrant was the continued violation thereof, that the President was compelled to issue a second proclamation, which he did May 11, 1872, putting the executive construction for a second time upon the law and commanding all officers of the Executive Departments of the Government to obey the law, and stated his second proclamation was issued because the first one had not been obeyed, namely:

Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted, on and after that date, eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; and whereas, on the 19th of May, 1869, by executive proclamation, it was directed that from and after that date no reduction should be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor; and whereas it is now represented to me that the act of Congress and the proclamation aforesaid have not been strictly observed by all officers of the Government having charge of such workmen, laborers, and mechanics:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby again call attention to the act of Congress aforesaid, and direct all officers of the Executive Departments of the Government having charge of the employment of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States to make no reduction in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor. (U. S. Stat. at Large, vol. 17, page 955.)

Meantime, petitions and memorials had been sent to Congress for relief, and on the 18th of May, 1872, seven days after the date of the above proclamation last quoted, Congress passed an act requiring accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and pay these employés of the Government the amounts which had been withheld from them in consequence of the reduction of the hours of labor from ten to eight hours per day, section 5 of which act is in the following language:

SEC. 2. That the proper accounting officers be, and are hereby, authorized and required, in the settlement of all accounts for the services of workmen, laborers, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the proclamation of the President concerning such pay, to settle and pay for the same without reduction on account of the reduction of the hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

This act, however, as will be seen, only covered a period of about ten months, from the 25th of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work, to the 19th of May, 1869, the date of the President's first proclamation forbidding any reduction of wages in consequence of the reduction of the hours of labor, when it should have covered the whole period from the 25th of June, 1868, the date of the eight-hour law, to the 18th of May, 1872, the date of the passage of the act requiring settlement and payment of the amounts withheld on account of the reduction of the hours of labor; but evidently the presumption of Congress was that the President's proclamation of May 19, 1869, had put an end to the violation of the law, and that no reduction had been made subsequent thereto; and in some Departments of the Government it had this effect, but in others no regard was paid to it, which fact is shown by the second proclamation of the President, issued on the 11th of May, 1872, above referred to.

In the debates upon the passage of the act of 18th of May, 1872, Mr. Morton, in the Senate, said:

I desire to make one suggestion in reply to the Senator from Connecticut as to what was the understanding here when the eight-hour law passed. My recollection is that the Senator from Ohio sitting behind me [Mr. SHERMAN] offered an amendment to that bill for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate as to whether there should be a full day's wages paid for eight hours work or only eight hours' labor paid for. My recollection is that the question was distinctly presented in that amendment, which was voted down by a very decided majority.

Mr. Sumner said:

It is unquestionably an act of justice. These workmen are out of their money. Some of them are dead and are represented by their families, and to them this small allowance is of very great importance. I do not think it advisable for us to take more time. I think we fairly owe the money, and therefore the sooner we pay it the better.

Under this last act new rolls were made out and a resettlement with the men was made, by which they were paid the same wages for eight hours' work that they were paid for ten hours' work before the passage of the eight-hour law, thereby making no reduction of wages in consequence of the reduction of the hours of labor. Yet notwithstanding this precedent, which clearly lays down the rule to be pursued in all future dealings between the Government and this class of its employés, some of the officers of the Government have ever since insisted that the men under their charge should either work ten hours per day or suffer a reduction of their wages to correspond with the reduction of the hours of labor, and so it has gone on until within a few weeks the last of the Government officers having charge of these employés, as I am informed, has issued orders enforcing the eight-hour law. But that does not right this great wrong of years. The plain provisions of this law in that time have been disregarded and outraged by those who should have been the last to have brushed it aside and brought it into contempt.

Men high in official positions have sneered at and insulted the employés and laborers of the Government when they have respectfully asked for their legal rights, and they have in terms been told to get them if they could. It is time a halt was called upon this sort of thing. As long as this law remains upon the statute-books the people demand its rigid enforcement, and without any of the equivocations of the past, at the hands of those whose duty it is by their oaths of office to enforce all laws; that it shall no more be nullified and trampled on by the rule of the past, the rule of the so-called "administrative discretion," which has singled out the only law ever enacted directly in the interest of labor, and has subjected it to the caprice or hostility of the official who for the time being has been clothed with a "little brief authority."

The eyes of hundreds of thousands of the wage-workers of the nation in sympathy with their long-suffering brothers are focused upon this House and its action of to-day, and they demand that here and now measures be taken to right this great wrong by favorable action upon the bill now before the House, which I was without dissenting vote instructed to report by the Committee on Labor, who, after a careful and exhaustive investigation of the whole subject, which is embodied in the report accompanying the bill, and as a result of successive hearings, determined in view of the facts that the law from the first was ignored, that the two proclamations of President Grant directing that "no reduction in pay should be had because of a reduction of the hours of labor" were disregarded, that the act of May 18, 1872, familiarly known as the construction act, which commanded the proper officers to "settle and pay without reduction because of the reduction of the hours of labor," had no more lasting effect than if it had been written upon the sands of the shore—I say the committee decided, at the request of the representatives of these laborers and mechanics who appeared before them, and who were laborers and employés themselves, that they would take their case out of the hands of the official jugglers with their legal rights, and send it to a tribunal where at least the law will be respected, and where a workman, I care not how humble he may be, may be heard, and if he has a just grievance under this law, will receive that justice so long denied him.

I claim that every man who has been forced to work for the Government ten hours for a day's wages since the passage of this law has been defrauded of his legal right, and the Government practically acknowledges as much in the case of the laborers and mechanics on the War, State, and Navy building in this city, who were paid full day's wages for eight hours labor during its construction; again, at Saint Louis, where the Government went on and repaid the workmen who labored on the public building there, and this was done long after the act of 1872, on the basis of ten hours labor; or, in other words, paid them two hours extra for their labor performed in excess of eight hours. The laborers on the Capitol grounds have received a full day's pay for eight hours' labor for the past ten or twelve years. In June, 1872, Mr. A. B. Mullet, then Supervising Architect of the United States, issued an order that certain employés on the public works under construction by him should receive the benefit of the eight-hour law. This they enjoyed until later, and after the inauguration of President Grant for a second term, when this same Mr. Mullet issued, in March, 1873, another order, which deprived these same laborers of the benefits of the eight-hour law, and compelled them to again work ten hours in defiance of the law. More like instances can be cited of the unequal and partial enforcement of this law, but these are sufficient to illustrate the arbitrary and capricious spirit of hostility and unfairness which has characterized the officers of the Government in dealing with this law.

Where, I ask any Representative upon this floor, is there any word in the original act of June 25, 1868, which can be construed as giving to any executive officer of the Government the right, which they have usurped, to enforce or annul the provisions of this law at their pleasure? To enforce its plain provisions fully in Washington and Saint Louis, and deny at the same period of time the enforcement of the same provisions of the same law in New York, Philadelphia, or Boston, to the same grade and class of their employés, such double dealing with the laborers of the Government is an outrage and a libel upon our fair fame as a nation. It is not in keeping and harmony with the spirit of our institutions, where all at least are presumed to stand as equals before the law, and equally and alike to share in its benefits and protection. The safety of every government depends upon the law-abiding spirit of its people. How important, then, that the Government itself should set an example of honest interpretation and enforcement of its laws. It is not enough that laws should be enacted; they must be faithfully enforced in the spirit and meaning intended by the framers. Nothing tends so much to create a suspicion of "class legislation" as a supposed purpose to ignore the claims for justice of one portion of the people because they labor, while laws thought to be in the interest of the wealthy receive prompt and scrupulous attention. If unjust laws are enacted they should be repealed, and not left a dead letter upon the statute-book to weaken and destroy the confidence of the people in the good faith and justice of the Government.

It is full time that a right by the officers of the Government to the exercise of an "administrative discretion" so manifestly unjust, so dangerous in example, with its tendency to weaken the confidence of the people and diminish their respect for all laws, so subversive of the underlying principles upon which our republican form of government rests, should cease, that their right to the further exercise of it should here and now be denied. By their illegal acts the great results which were intended to have been secured by the original framers of the law in the interest of humanity and progress, by this experiment and example of the General Government, have for the time being been defeated. Pass this bill, and it will be the end of this conspiracy and rebellion of the officers of the Government against its laws, and will forever settle the question as to what Congress intended when it passed the original act of June 25, 1868. "Let justice be done though the heavens fall."

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LOVERING. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I would like to know whether the committee which reported this bill has formed any estimate of the number of claims which will be made under it, if enacted, and the aggregate amount of those claims.

Mr. LOVERING. It is impossible to make any exact estimate, though there may perhaps be made an approximate estimate based upon the amount of money paid by the Government during the time when the law was not fully enforced, from June 25, 1868—the period between the passage of the original act and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the President's first proclamation, a period of ten months and twenty-four days.

The amount required to pay the claimants in that time was something like $304,000. At that time the law was grossly and wholly violated. It would be a very easy matter, taking that as a basis, to make a calculation as to the amount required to pay the claimants for the subsequent time. I have not made an exact calculation; but I know that since that date the officers of the Government, by every means within their power, by every scheme which could be invented, undertook to evade and defeat the law—sometimes by getting its work done through contractors, thus getting the matter of hiring labor off the hands of the Government; sometimes by special contracts with employés, or engaging them by the hour or by the piece, day, or month. I think it safe to say that more than half the employés have since that time been employed on that basis. Taking the amount paid during the period I have named, and calculating on that basis the amount for the subsequent period, it would give something like $4,000,000, or $5,000,000. Supposing that the law had been violated to the extent of one-half the labor done for the Government, and I think it safe to say it has, the amount would be about two or two and a half millions. I have, however, heard it stated by gentlemen who are better qualified to judge than myself on these matters that the amount involved in these claims would not exceed one million or a million and a half of dollars.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Is it a fact that a large part of this work has been done under written contracts specifying the number of hours?

Mr. LOVERING. It is a fact. And I hold in my hand a document which purports to be "reports" of hired men, but which is a contract disguised with that heading. It reads as follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
Rock Island County, ss:

Personally appeared before me, a clerk of the county court in and for the county and State aforesaid [here follow the names of fifty-two employés], who, being duly sworn, upon their oaths do say, that they, as employés at the United States arsenal at Rock Island, Illinois, as well as other employés at said arsenal, have been required to sign the contract (a copy of which is hereto attached and marked Exhibit A) or get no employment at said arsenal, and that they, as well as others, signed said contract under protest, knowing that eight hours were a legal day's work in Government employ, and that they so continued to work under said contract until the night of the 2d day of April, A. D. 1884.

[Here follow the signatures of fifty-two employés aforesaid.]

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of April, A. D. 1884.
[Seal of court.] RICHARD A. DONALDSON,
Clerk County Court.

That was in 1883, fifteen years after the passage of the eight-hour law, which expressly commanded that eight hours should be the length of a day's work. In spite of that law the commandant of the arsenal says that ten hours shall be a day's work. Then this paper continues:

[Exhibit A.]

REPORT OF MEN HIRED.

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL, ——— —, 188-.

To comply with the requirements of G. O. No. 53, A. G. O., Washington, D. C., June 1, 1877, a day's work at this arsenal, when the length of the day will permit, is made to consist of ten hours; but to conform more strictly to the ruling custom in this vicinity, as is required by law, one-half hour of this time is allowed to the workmen for the longer walk to their work than is necessary in the cities, making the hours of labor nine and one-half hours per day. In winter, when the hours of daylight will not permit nine and one-half hours of labor, the number of hours fixed by orders from time to time will constitute a full day's work. When a workman is employed only a part of a day he will be allowed for such part of a day's work the number of hours he works divided by the number of hours that constitute a day's work at the time. Special workmen, such as foremen, guards, firemen, shop attendants, &c., whose duties require their presence more hours than other workmen, will be allowed only one day's labor for the full number of hours of service required of them in each twenty-four hours, and their wages will be fixed accordingly. We, the undersigned, agree to the above:

Signature.	Name.	For what purpose.	Wages.

Respectfully submitted.
——— ———, Foreman.
Forwarded approved.
——— ———, In Charge.
Approved.
——— ———, Commanding.

That is to say, if these men work twelve or fourteen hour a day they shall receive no more than the price allowed for ten hours' labor.

At the close of this I read:

We, the undersigned, agree to the above.

Then there are blank spaces for the signatures of workmen.

This is an instance of how the officers of the Government evade the spirit and intention of the eight-hour law as recent as the year 1883 by forcing its employés to sign a written contract to work ten hours or obtain no work.

I have here the order of the War Department with reference to work at this very same arsenal. It is dated December 26, 1883. In this order the Secretary recites:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, December 26, 1883.

SIR: I transmit to you herewith separate petitions purporting to be signed by employés of the arsenal at Benicia, the arsenal at Rock Island, and the arsenal at Frankford, representing that the provisions of the "eight-hour law" (section 3738 of the Revised Statutes) are not complied with at these arsenals, and praying that they be enforced.

The law referred to does not prohibit Government officers, for good reasons based on the peculiar character of the duty of the employé or upon the exigency of the public service, from making an agreement with an employé of the character named in the act, that he shall render his services for an agreed price during more or less than eight hours in a day, and it may be that some or all of the petitioners are employed under such an engagement.

It is, however, my opinion that in the absence of a public exigency the continuance of active work at Government manufacturing establishments for more than eight hours a day is in violation of the intent of the statute, and you will please to instruct the commanding officers of the above-named arsenals accordingly.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

To the CHIEF OF ORDNANCE.

Then he goes on and acknowledges the validity of the eight-hour law in the following language:

It is, however, my opinion that in the absence of a public exigency the continuance of active work at Government manufacturing establishments for more than eight hours a day is a violation of the intent of the statute, and you will be pleased to instruct the commanding officers of the above-named arsenals accordingly.

Now, mind me, that order was issued by the commandant at Rock Island, Ill., through the proper channels on the 26th of December, 1883. I have in my hand here the sworn statement (see appendix) of fifty-two of the employés of that arsenal that that order did not reach their ears until the evening of April 2, 1884, three months and seven days after it was issued; and that is a fair example, Mr. Chairman, of how this law has been treated at the hands of Government officials. There is another and recent example and vindication for and enforcement of the eight-hour law. In the Washington Star of June 25, 1884, I read the following:

EIGHT HOURS' WORK AND INCREASED PAY.

Mr. Zeph. Jones, superintendent of the Pension building, received to-day a communication from General M. C. Meigs, directing him (Jones) to "announce to the bricklayers that from and after this day, until further notice, wages of bricklayers are fixed at $4.50 per day all round, and that the hours of labor also, until further notice, are fixed at eight hours per day. This is done after consultation with and the approval of the honorable the Secretary of the Interior under the eight-hour law, and the wages are those found on inquiry to be now prevailing in the city."

Before this communication or order was forwarded or issued these men received $4 per day for ten hours' labor, a less price, as I am informed, than was paid by private parties on private work. Now, under these instructions and with the approval of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, they are to labor but eight hours and are to receive $4.50 per day; or, in other words, they are to receive until further notice the benefits of the eight-hour law, as intended by the original framers of the act, in all its full intent and meaning.

Mr. STORM. If the gentleman will permit me I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. LOVERING. Certainly.

Mr. STORM. I desire to make an inquiry concerning the second section of the bill. These laborers amount to tens of thousands, and that second section refers all these claims on the part of these laborers to the Court of Claims, and judgment is to be rendered severally on each claim. Now, why not have a provision in the bill, where there is no dispute about the facts and the amounts due, that the Departments shall be at liberty to pay to these parties the small sums which the facts will show to be due to them; because I take it, Mr. Chairman, that in nine cases out of ten there is no dispute as to the fact that these parties worked a certain number of hours in excess of the eight hours provided in the law.

As the bill is, it practically compels them to go to the Court of Claims, and, as many of the amounts are quite small, the costs which the United States would have to pay would be as much or more than the claims themselves. As I have said, the bill compels every one to go to the Court of Claims, and in reference to these small claimants objection might be obviated by inserting a provision allowing the Departments, where there is no dispute as to the facts and amounts, to settle with the parties without going to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LOVERING. This bill was born of the experience and of the suffering and treatment these parties have received at the hands of these officers themselves since the time when they were entitled to payment of their claims. There are now under the original act of 1872 hundreds of claims still pending in the accounting offices of the Treasury Department where, under the construction put upon the law by the accounting officers themselves, these claims have been brushed aside and payment refused.

Mr. STORM. In the cases indicated by me where the amounts were small and the facts undisputed under this bill the Departments might be permitted to pay without compelling the claimants to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LOVERING. The law has been evaded; it has been picked to pieces, construed and misconstrued; it has been got around in every conceivable shape and form; and the workmen of the Government have come to this committee in despair and asked this bill be passed, presenting it to them as their bill; and I think it no more than fair the House should accede to their demand and give it to them, as they are the interested parties and have asked for it.

Mr. STORM. I understand an amendment will be made of the character I have suggested, and as it will obviate the objection I have raised, I will not say anything more about it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts takes his seat I will be glad to ask him a question, if he will yield the floor to me.

Mr. LOVERING. With pleasure.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If I understand the law on the statute-book it simply provides that a day's labor when performed by a Government employé shall be eight hours. Do I understand the gentleman to assume where the Government by special contract——

Mr. LOVERING. I make no such assumption.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Do I understand the gentleman to say where one of the Government employés by special contract agrees to exceed the number of hours by increasing the compensation——

Mr. LOVERING. I made no such assumption.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Do I understand where a Government employé enters voluntarily into the Government service with notice that a day of ten hours will be exacted, and in pursuance of that notice performs labor for ten hours, he has a legal and equitable claim against the Government for an excess of over eight hours a day?

Mr. LOVERING. I should say no. I think not, because it was decided by what is called the Martin case.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I confess to having read this bill, and it is sufficiently comprehensive to permit an employé to assert a claim against the Government in either of the two contingencies. I have mentioned either that of special contract for service of ten hours a day, or where, in pursuance of notice, the office has been accepted to perform ten hours a day of labor. In either case the claimant may go to the Court of Claims and make demand for the excess of labor over eight hours provided in the statute.

Now, the gentleman will understand me that I believe the law ought to be enforced strictly.

Mr. LOVERING. I now yield the floor.

APPENDIX.

Petition for the enforcement of the eight-hour law, and to pay to employés of the Government wages hitherto withheld in violation of the "eight-hour law."

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that they are laborers, workmen, or mechanics who now are or who have been employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States subsequent to the 19th day of May, 1869; that on the 25th day of June, 1868, the following became the law of the land:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed or who may be hereafter employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed." (15 Statutes at Large, 77.)

Your petitioners further show that on the 19th day of May, 1869, U. S. Grant, then President of the United States, issued a proclamation, from which the following extract is taken:

"Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted on and after that date eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, and repealed all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith:

"Now therefore I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby direct that from and after this date no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of such reduction of the hours of labor." (16 Statutes at Large, 1127.)

Your petitioners further show that on the 11th day of May, 1872, the President of the United States issued another proclamation, of which the following is an extract, to wit:

"Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1868, constituted on and after that date eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States;

"And whereas on the 19th day of May, in the year 1869, by executive proclamation it was directed that from and after that date no reduction should be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of such reduction of the hours of labor;

"And whereas it is now represented to me that the act of Congress and the proclamation aforesaid have not been strictly observed by all the officers of the Government having charge of such laborers, workmen, and mechanics:

"Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby again call attention to the act of Congress aforesaid, and direct all officers of the executive department of the Government having charge of the employment and payment of laborers, workmen, or mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States to make no reduction in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of the reduction of the hours of labor." (17 Statutes at Large, 955.)

And your petitioners further show that the Congress of the United States passed an act, approved on the 18th day of May, 1872, the second section of which is as follows:

"That the proper accounting officers be, and hereby are, authorized and required, in the settlement of all accounts for the services of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the proclamation of the President concerning such pay, to settle and pay for the same, without reduction on account of reduction of hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." (17 Statutes at Large, 134.)

And your petitioners further show that, notwithstanding the plain letter and spirit of the eight-hour law, and notwithstanding the Presidential proclamations enforcing it, and notwithstanding the interpretation given to the law by the act of Congress last quoted, which your petitioners are advised by counsel is binding upon all executive and judicial officers, your petitioners have been compelled to work ten hours for a day's work under penalty of dismissal or a reduction of their daily wages of 20 per cent. in case they worked but eight hours for a day's work.

The following order will show how and upon what authority the eight-hour law, which is now enforced, was violated for six months in each year for six years:

[General Order No. 227.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 30, 1877.

The following decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is published for the information of the Navy:

* * * * * * *

Under this construction of the law, regulating public labor, given by the Supreme Court of the United States, the Department has fixed the rate of labor for mechanics, foremen, leading men, and laborers on the basis of ten hours a day. All workmen electing to labor only eight hours per day will receive a proportionate reduction of their wages.

R. W. THOMPSON, Secretary of the Navy.

The above order was issued by the honorable Secretary of the Navy upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, No. 401, October term, 1876, the United States, appellants, vs. Arthur Martin.

The judicial action is reported in the case of Martin vs. U. S., 4 Otto, 400.

The Martin case had no merit in it. Martin worked under a special contract, was paid extra wages, then made claim under the act of May 18, 1872; his claim was adjusted. The amount found due under that act was paid and he gave a receipt in full, which relieved the Government of any further indebtedness.

The above order was enforced at the navy-yard, League Island, Pa., by the commandant, as shown by the following—a similar order being issued at each of the other navy-yards:

[Circular.]

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD,
League Island, July 7, 1877.

The following will be the working hours at this yard under the ten-hour rule: From 7.30 a. m. until 12.30 p. m.; from 1 p. m. until 6 p. m.

E. SIMPSON, Commodore, Commandant.

The eight-hour law has been violated from on or about June, 1877, to March 26, 1883, since which time it has been enforced, under orders of Hon. William E. Chandler, Secretary of the Navy, of that date, and is now in operation at all navy-yards; and that from August 25 to September 19, 1883, while the United States steamer Ossipee was on Cramp & Son's dry-dock, in Philadelphia, Pa., undergoing repairs, the employés were worked ten hours per day, and received one and a quarter day's wages for ten hours' work, thereby carrying out the law as passed by Congress June 25, 1868.

We would also state that, during the time the law was violated, the employés were paid the same rate of wages for eight hours' work as they received for ten hours' work.

As to the War Department, we would state that the "eight-hour law" has been violated in the same manner as in the Navy Department. The employés of arsenals at Benicia, Cal., Rock Island, Ill., and Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa., petitioned Hon. Robert T. Lincoln, Secretary of War, several months ago, to enforce the law, and the following order was promulgated at Frankford arsenal, namely:

[Post Order No. 3.]

THE FRANKFORD ARSENAL, January 8, 1884.

I. In accordance with the decision of the Secretary of War, dated January 3, 1884, the working hours at this arsenal will, on and after the 9th instant, be as follows, for all days of the week: From 8 a. m. until 12 o'clock noon, and from 12.30 until 4.30 o'clock p. m.

II. The officers in charge of shops will prepare and submit, for approval of the commanding officer, detailed regulations regarding signals for beginning and stopping work, roll-calls, &c.

By command of Major S. C. Lyford.

FRANK BAKER,
Lieutenant of Ordnance, Post Adjutant.

Official:

FRANK BAKER, Lieutenant of Ordnance.

At the arsenal at Benicia, Cal., Rock Island, Ill., and other posts under the immediate charge of the War Department, the employés are compelled to work nine and ten hours per day, while at the arsenal at Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa., the employés are receiving the benefit of the eight-hour law, by order of Hon. Robert T. Lincoln, Secretary of War, dated January 3, 1884.

Your petitioners therefore pray that a law be enacted directing and requiring your petitioners to be paid for the extra work which they have performed in excess of eight hours per day since the act quoted above provided for paying the workmen up to the 19th day of May, 1869, and appropriating the money to make said payments. And your petitioners further pray that such penal laws may be enacted as will for the future compel the administrative officers of the Government to respect the rights of labor under the eight-hour law.

Respectfully submitted by

J. M. DAVIS,
Representative of Petitioners, Richmond Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that at the proper time I will move the amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read. As it will be seen, one of them obviates the objection raised to the second section of the present bill by my colleague [Mr. STORM].

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments will be read now for information.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is all. I desire only giving notice that at the proper time I will move them as amendments to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "work," in line 8 of section 1, the following words: "At the price per day as regulated by private parties in the vicinity in which the work was performed, without reference to the number of hours' work required by such parties."

In line 2, section 2, after the word "day," insert: "And which have not been or may not be settled upon that basis."

After the word "for," in line 4 of this section, insert the words "as such."

Strike out in line 5 the words "as provided for in the first section of this act," and insert "called for by the contract, express or implied."

Mr. HOPKINS. I now reserve the remainder of my hour.

Mr. CLAY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if there is any question that these laborers in the employ of the Government did not receive the same amount of wages that were paid by private parties in the communities in which they worked. Is there any question as to that fact, that they did receive the same wages given to other parties by private persons in the communities where the work was done?

Mr. HOPKINS. The facts are not uniform in that respect. In some cases they did, in others they did not. But this bill, I think, will make that practice uniform. The amendment I propose to offer makes an express contract in reference to the matter, so that there must be uniformity.

Mr. CLAY. There is an act of 1862 I understand limiting the wages to be paid to laborers under Government contracts to the same amount as that paid by private contractors in the same vicinity.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is.

Mr. CLAY. If that be so, does not your amendment make a nullity of this bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think not.

Mr. CLAY. If they receive the amount they are entitled to under the law, or the amount that private laborers receive under private contracts, then they have gotten all they could have obtained under this bill as proposed to be amended by you.

Mr. HOPKINS. That law provided that the employés under the Government should receive the same per diem of wages as is paid in the localities by private employers. Subsequently Congress passed an act declaring eight hours to be a legal day. Now take a case where parties in that locality were paying at the rate of ten hours for a legal day. Then the Government officers who would restrict their employés, or deduct from them pro rata, those who served only eight hours, would be violating this law; and it is the intention of the amendment I have offered to give the laborer the benefit of the two hours that they are required to work, and not allow any reduction from their wages.

But I object to this being taken out of the limit of the time to be occupied by those in favor of the bill. Only two hours will be allowed, and one hour we supposed will be occupied in opposition.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not aware that the time was limited. I certainly did not consent to it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I propose at the expiration of two hours to ask the House to close the general debate, and inasmuch as one hour is to be given in support of the bill only, I think it unjust to occupy any portion of that time in opposition to it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me one moment? Is it not true that the employés of the Government have received as much in all instances as is given to laborers for private parties in the communities where the work is done for a similar service?

Mr. HOPKINS. They have not received for eight hours as much.

Mr. McMILLIN. But as much for a day's work as is given in that locality?

Mr. HOPKINS. I must decline to yield any further. The gentleman will have time to make his own argument.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have examined into the matter and I think they do receive just as much.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, if this bill shall pass it will make a raid on the Treasury second only to the arrearages-of-pension act; and, sir, it will not be so much of a second, either. I undertake to say if it shall become a law, that $30,000,000 will not foot the accounts; and I say so after laborious and exhaustive investigation. It is one of those bills, Mr. Chairman, which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] ought to support if he desire to carry out in good faith his favorite proposition of emptying the Treasury by every means.

What is the eight-hour law? I undertook when the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill were up for consideration some time ago to try to condense within a few minutes a statement of what the law was and what purpose some of those amendments plainly indicated the Secretary of the Navy intended to accomplish. I am glad now to have the opportunity, if the House will give me its attention, to amplify and complete the remarks I was unable to make then.

The eight-hour law is a mere declaration of what shall constitute a day's work when performed for the Government without any special contract. Suppose the Government agreed to pay so much per month for labor? There is a lunar month and a calendar month; there is one calendar month, except in leap-year, of twenty-eight days; there are four calendar months of thirty days each, and the remainder of the months of the year have thirty-one days each. Now, the Government can certainly define by statute a measure of time that shall cover a day or a month, as well as an hour, a minute, or a second. Owing to the different length of days, and the different climates prevailing on this vast continent, the different facilities and opportunities for labor, the hours for a day's work, even for the Government, were irregular and unequal previous to 1868. The mechanics and employés of the Government complained that in certain parts of the country at certain seasons of the year they had to work more hours for the same pay than Government employés did elsewhere, and hence Congress in 1868 passed a declaratory law that eight hours should constitute a day's work. But it never said that the laborer could not make a contract for a longer time. It never said the Government officer or agent should be punished or be prohibited without punishment from requiring a greater length of time to constitute a day's work by contract. It only undertook to say what should constitute a day's labor when there was no special agreement about it.

Now, sir, from the foundation of the Government up to that time the good sense and honesty of the heads of Departments and public officers were a guide in employing labor, both as to hours of work and rate of wages; controlled, however, by the hours and rates prevailing in the vicinity for the same sort of work. There never was any statute regulating a mechanical day's labor until 1862, and the act of 1862 relating to the navy-yards is of force to-day. The so-called eight-hour law of 1868 does not repeal it. That act of 1862 reads thus:

That the hours of labor and the rate of wages of the employés in the navy-yards shall conform as nearly as is consistent with the public interest with those of private establishments in the immediate vicinity of the respective yards, to be determined by the commandants of the navy-yards, subject to the approval and revision of the Secretary of the Navy.

If that law has ever been changed I would like to see where it was changed. I know it is not included in the Revised Statutes. It is only one of the many laws omitted in that edition of the statutes which ought to be there. But I defy any man on this floor to say that the act of 1862 relating to labor in the Navy Department has ever been repealed, altered, or amended except to prescribe that when there is no contract between the Government officer and the employés as to time eight hours shall constitute a day's work.

The case has been different as to clerical labor. But before I allude to the clerical service, I will say that although no statute was ever passed in regard to mechanical labor by Congress until 1862, and then only in reference to the navy-yards, President Van Buren did, in 1840, issue an order requiring that nine hours in winter and eleven hours in summer, with one hour's recess for dinner, should constitute a day's work for all mechanics. As I said, there was no law but custom—the custom of the vicinity—up to 1840, when President Van Buren issued his order, and there was nothing but custom and that order to govern mechanical labor until 1862, when Congress passed the act that I have just read, in relation to the employés in the navy-yards. And that is the law to-day, which your Secretary is violating with audacious impunity.

Until 1836 the discretion of the heads of Departments governed clerical labor about the hours that the clerks should work and the Departments should be kept open. But in 1836 Congress passed an act that they should be opened eight hours in winter and ten hours in summer. In 1874 that law was repealed, so as to restore to the discretion of heads of Departments the length of time in each day the Departments should be kept open and clerks and employés required to write and work. And we know that they have kept the Departments open since 1874 only from 9 in the morning until 4 in the evening, with an hour's intermission, which makes but six hours' labor a clerical day's work. This explains why there are twice as many clerical employés in the Departments as there ought to be, and why members of Congress who have often wanted to go to the Departments before 9 o'clock in the morning or after 4 in the evening have not been able to do it.

So much, then, in a general way as regards the history of legislation both in reference to mechanical and clerical labor for the Government. There are two noted facts in connection with the eight-hour law: one is that nothing is ever said about it except in Presidential election years, and the other is that whenever most fuss is heard in regard to it a big haul on the Treasury is afoot. One can not help but suspect that even President Van Buren's order regulating the hours of labor in 1840 was designed to catch the mechanics' vote, as that was a Presidential election year. As to the attacks on the Treasury, one grand raid has already been made under the 15 per cent. compensation to contractors for Government buildings, and this bill now proposes to make still another.

The act was passed in 1868, when General Grant was for the first time a candidate for President of the United States. Another act was passed in 1872 providing compensation for all laborers between the time the first act was passed and when the first proclamation was issued by President Grant in the spring of 1869. Mark you, it only provided pay for ten months and twenty-four days. If this act of 1872 had been intended in good faith, why did it not provide for paying the unsettled accounts of laborers up to the time it was passed, and also provide for compulsory payments in future? If the act had been designed to make a mandatory instead of a declaratory law that a laborer should work eight hours and no more, why did it not say so; and why did it not attach a penalty for any officer or agent who should violate it?

I will tell you the reason why I suspect the act was not made mandatory and one reason why no appropriations were made in 1872 to carry it out except for ten months and twenty-four days. It was because certain parties connected with General Grant's administration concluded they saw where they could make millions of dollars out of the so-called eight-hour law by first getting large appropriations to erect public buildings and then letting them out by contract and paying the contractor 15 per cent. on the gross amount as profit for his care and supervision.

The post-office building at Boston, the post-office building at New York, the court-house at Philadelphia, the custom-house buildings at Hartford, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, and Chicago, and the State, War and Navy building in this city, which up to 1880 had cost over $32,000,000, exclusive of the sites for the buildings, were erected under what purported to be the 15 per cent. compensation to contractors; that is, the Government paid full price for the granite, the lime, the tools, workshops, and all the materials used in the construction of those eight mammoth edifices; paid full wages to the laborers, both common and skilled; furnished clerks, footed all the bills, and then paid the contractor 15 per cent. on the gross amount as his compensation.

While, as I have said, these eight buildings, exclusive of the sites, some of them finished only recently, and one, the State, War and Navy building, not yet completed, cost over $32,000,000, and the contractors were paid 15 per cent. on the total cost, everything was done that encouraged the contractors to pay the costliest prices for the materials and the highest wages for labor, because it increased the amount upon which they received a percentage.

And what was the pitiful pretext of General Grant's architectural bureau for making that splendid donation to the contractor? It was this: "Here is an eight-hour law; if we let the erection of these buildings out to contractors and pay them 15 per cent. on the total cost for their compensation, we will then save the Government 5 per cent. of the money which it would have to pay to the laborers under the eight-hour law." And that miserable theft continued during both administrations of General Grant and during the greater part of the administration of the fraud Hayes.

The Government paid for the tools and powder and shops to take out the granite at the quarries in Maine and Massachusetts and elsewhere for the construction of these eight buildings. I remember one case of a quarry where Government paid about $130,000 for buildings, tools, &c. After the contract had been complied with for the delivery of the rock for two of these eight large public buildings the tools, workshops, &c., were advertised in two obscure papers, and sold for the petty sum of twelve or thirteen hundred dollars; and then the contractors turned right around in a short while and resold them to the Governmert at first cost, to commence operations for quarrying, dressing, and shaping the rock for the erection of some of the other public buildings. And all that was done under the pretext of saving 5 per cent to the Government in order to flank, so to speak, the eight-hour law.

That is one raid which has been perpetrated on the Treasury. Shall you permit another by passing this bill to allow the laborers who constructed the eight buildings mentioned to come in and prove their accounts for more wages? Notice the words, how comprehensive and general they are, that "whoever, as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, has been employed by or on behalf of the Government" shall come in and "prove his account" and draw his pay at the rate of a day's wages for eight hours' work.

I have alluded to these eight large and costly buildings only as having been constructed by contract in that way. Most of the small public buildings, until recently, were erected by the Government itself. At a low estimate, for the last sixteen years since this so-called eight-hour law was passed, which I contend was merely a statutory declaration, like a statute declaring that sixty minutes shall constitute an hour—during these sixteen years the Government has appropriated probably about $7,000,000 a year on the average for public buildings. That would be over $100,000,000 for public buildings from the time this act proposes to make the Government liable. How much has been appropriated and expended for rivers and harbors? Nearly $100,000,000 more.

As these men are to get 25 per cent. more wages than they were paid in every instance where they worked over eight hours a day, you will perceive at once that one-fourth of $200,000,000 in the two items alone which I have alluded to, public buildings and rivers and harbors, would be $50,000,000. But it is not that much, and I will explain why. It is only half that sum.

There is no contest about the eight-hour law during the six winter months. The sun does not shine long enough for laborers to work any more hours a day than eight, when you allow a little time for dinner. But during the six summer months there is time for ten hours' and even twelve hours' work a day; and we know that domestic servants and agricultural laborers work even longer than that.

The only contest which these laborers make in this claim-agents' bill, for it is nothing else than a claim-agents' bill, is about their compensation during the six summer months. Government establishments as well as private establishment in this country average only about eight hours a day in the winter months. But in the summer time, as I have said, private workshops and factories average at least ten hours a day. It is proposed by this bill to pay the laborers for two hours a day more than they worked during six months in the year. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

The custom of the Departments, as well as President Van Buren's order and the act of 1862, in brief the law, is that the officers and agents of the Government shall pay to public employés the same wages for the same hours of labor that is paid in private establishments in the vicinity for the same kind of work. There are those who pretend to construe this eight-hour law as mandatory, to compel the Government to give ten hours' pay for eight hours' work during the six summer months, thereby making a donation of two hours' pay for six months of the year to Government employés more than employés in private establishments in the neighborhood receive. Hence as they only seek to get 25 per cent. more wages for the six summer months, it will be seen that it will amount to only half of the $50,000,000, which is about one-fourth of the appropriations for public buildings and for rivers and harbors alone.

Then go to your navy-yards, go to the War Department, go to the Interior Department. As this is Presidential election year, even Secretary Teller is afflicted with a desire to enforce the eight-hour law. There is a pension building being erected on Judiciary Square in this city now, and perhaps the idea is to draw mechanics from abroad—Democrats, at big pay—so that they can leave about election time to vote the Republican ticket. This eight-hour law was enforced or not enforced almost anywhere and anyhow as it suited the Government officers to construe it up to 1876.

In that year there was a suit brought by a man named Martin to have the law construed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Martin had been employed for five years in the steam-heating works and gas-room of the Naval Academy at Annapolis. About one-third of the five years he worked eight hours a day; during the other two-thirds he worked twelve hours a day. He claimed that the eight-hour law was not declaratory but mandatory. He sued the Government for the additional pay that he claimed was due him. His case went to the Supreme Court and was decided against him in 1876. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the decision of that court in 4 Otto's Reports.

The Clerk read as follows:

There are several things which the act does not regulate, which it may be worth while to notice.

First. It does not establish the price to be paid for a day's work. Skilled labor necessarily commands a higher price than mere manual labor, and whether wages are high or low depends chiefly upon the inquiry whether those having labor to bestow are more numerous than those who desire the service of the laborer.

Principals, so far as the law can give the power, are entitled to employ as many workmen, and of whatever degree of skill, and at whatever price they think fit, and except in some special cases, as of children or orphans, the hours of labor and the price to be paid are left to the determination of the parties interested. The statute of the United States does not interfere with this principle. It does not specify any sum which shall be paid for the labor of eight hours, nor that the price shall be more when the hours are greater or less when the hours are fewer. It is silent as to everything except the direction to its officers that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for a laborer.

Second. That statute does not provide that the employer and the laborer may not agree with each other as to what time shall constitute a day's work. There are some branches of labor, connected with furnaces, founderies, steam or gas works, where the labor and exposure of eight hours a day would soon exhaust the strength of a laborer and render him permanently an invalid. The Government officer is not prohibited from knowing these facts, nor from agreeing, when it is proper, that a less number of hours than eight shall be accepted as a day's work. Nor does the statute intend that, where out-of-door labor in the long days of summer may be offered for twelve hours at a uniform price, the officer may not so contract with a consenting laborer.

We regard the statute chiefly as in the nature of a direction from a principal to his agent, that eight hours is deemed to be a proper length of time for a day's labor, and that his contracts shall be based upon that theory. It is a matter between the principal and his agent, in which a third party has no interest. The proclamation of the President and the act of 1872 are in harmony with this view of the statute.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that contracts fixing or giving a different length of time as the day's work are legal and binding upon the parties making them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, in addition to that decision in 1876, the Supreme Court rendered another decision in 1877 covering the case of contractors. There was a contractor named Ordway who furnished granite for the outside portion of the State, War, and Navy Departments' building. He quarried the stone down near Richmond, Va. A man named Driscoll, one of Ordway's employés, under the 15 per cent. compensation contract that I spoke of a little time ago, sued the Government also for his extra pay. The Government paid the employés, furnished the tools, erected the workshops, employed the clerk that kept the accounts for the Government so as to prevent Ordway from cheating it. But Driscoll, who was an employé of Ordway, claimed that Ordway was not a contractor, but was the agent of the Government itself; and he brought suit upon that ground. The court held that he was a contractor; that nothing prevented the Government from making a contract in that way; and whether Driscoll was working for a contractor or for the Government, he should be paid only what he bargained to receive.

Now, here are two decisions of the highest tribunal in the land upon this question. From the date of those decisions down to last year every Department of the Government acquiesced in the decisions. I know the fact, for in the Forty-sixth Congress I received letters from the Secretaries of the Navy, War, and Treasury Departments in President Hayes's Cabinet admitting it, and stating that they obeyed the law as interpreted by the court of last resort. Even President Arthur's Cabinet conformed to those decisions, until Secretary Chandler concluded last year that he would get ready in time to do a good job of electioneering in the next Presidential election. I wish to emphasize the fact, by repeating it, that for six years all the Departments conformed to the act of 1862 in relation to the employment of laborers in the navy-yards, which act in principle had prevailed from the foundation of the Government in all the Departments, in the employment of all sorts of labor.

Mr. Secretary Chandler determined that he would revive the eight-hour law for reasons best known to himself, but which we can readily surmise. I fear, I know, I charge it was in view of the near approach of another Presidential election, yet it may have been for some more 15 per cent. contracts. And the Secretary of War, too, commenced recognizing the eight-hour law again, just a few months ago, for the first time after six years. And we have to-day been informed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] that the Secretary of the Interior has done so in his Department only a few days ago.

Now, when I undertook to intimate the other day, in discussing the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill, that the Secretary of the Navy could find a fund in several of those amendments which would answer the purposes that the star-route frauds answered four years ago, some gentlemen derided that statement. No one on this floor, however, did it except my friend from New York [Mr. COX]; but the clever correspondent of that incorruptible newspaper, the New York Herald, said: "Poor Mr. TILLMAN did not know that the Secretary of the Navy had said he would not construct any of the vessels provided for in the bill in the navy-yards;" and the leading newspaper in my own State copied that article, apparently with a relish, under the caption "Caustic comments."

Now, in this connection, if those Senate amendments should be adopted, I would like to know, if the vessels are to be constructed on private account, the meaning of two provisions of the amendments. In the naval appropriation bill, as printed with the amendments, we find on page 20, at line 478, these words:

And in the event that such vessels or any of them shall be built by contract such building shall be, &c.

Clearly implying a doubt, or at all events leaving it to the discretion of Mr. Chandler, whether they should be built by contract or not.

And if they were to be built by contract what is the meaning of another provision of another amendment, page 21, line 193, which reads:

And provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall utilize the national navy-yards with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government either in the building of said ships or any parts thereof as fully and to as great extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

Who is to be the judge about "building of said ships or any parts thereof in the navy-yards" but this man Chandler? Are his antecedents such that we can trust him when he openly violates the act of 1862 as well as the eight-hour law, and after his Department and every other during six years have acquiesced in the interpretation placed upon the eight-hour law by the Supreme Court in two decisions? I would like to know if it is unfounded suspicion, or whether I have reasonable ground not to be willing to trust him in regard to building the ships by contract or in the navy-yards?

Moreover, suppose he were to construct by contract the cruisers provided for in the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill, what would hinder him from exercising his elastic use of the eight-hour law so as to pay the mechanics and laborers in the private ship-yards ten hours' wages for eight hours' work, and a commission to the contractor or rent for his ship-yard. At this point I will read an extract from a "circular" that has been handed me by a "claim agent" or "eight-hour doctrinaire," I do not know which:

The eight-hour law has been violated from on or about June, 1877, to March 26, 1883, since which time it has been enforced, under orders of Hon. William E. Chandler, Secretary of the Navy, of that date, and is now in operation at all navy-yards; and that from August 25 to September 19, 1883, while the United States steamer Ossipee was on Cramp & Son's dry-dock, in Philadelphia, Pa., undergoing repairs, the employés were worked ten hours per day and received one and a quarter day's wages for ten hours' work, thereby carrying out the law as passed by Congress June 30, 1868.

We would also state that during the time that the law was violated the employés were paid the same rate of wages for eight hours' work as they received for ten hours' work.

How very liberal the Secretary would be with the public money on the eve of a Presidential election can well be inferred from all these facts.

If we pass the pending river and harbor bill or the pending bills for erecting public buildings one-eighth of the total amount can be taken out for labor, because the granite rock, lime, and other materials cost but little, since it is labor that constitutes the chief expenditure in the character of buildings the Government erects or the work it does on rivers and harbors. See what a fund can be used to control laborers' votes. This eight-hour law, carried out according to the provision of the bill and according to the construction placed on it by the heads of Departments in the present administration during the last few months, will virtually make every laborer and mechanic of the Government an officer, because he can not get employed except he has political influence behind him unless he will promise to vote the way they want him to vote. It is a pretty considerable bribe to be able to give a first-class or common mechanic 25 per cent. advance on his wages for six months in the year.

Who does not know that any laborer prefers Government employment to private employment even at the same wages. The Government agent does not oversee his laborers like a private employer. He does not follow them and exact all the work they can do. A private employer may fail to pay, but the Government never does. Not only is the work lighter, not only is the pay surer, but it is pleasanter every way. That is advantage enough, especially when taken in connection with the fact that the Government officers and agents are required by law to pay the prevailing wages for the same hours of labor that exist in the vicinity, and they always pay the highest average; they are not particular; it is not their money that they spend. The Government can get the pick of the laborers of the country when it pays no more than private employers do for the same service and the same hours.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is not only a raid upon the Treasury, but it proposes to create an aristocracy of labor. It is to make an officer practically, as I remarked before, with the right to a salary attached for six months in the year, out of every mechanic or employé of the Government. Now, Mr. Chairman, has not this Government got patronage enough? It caused the murder of one President, and unless we adopt civil-service reform may cause the murder of others. What better rule can be adopted to regulate the hours and the wages of labor than the act of 1862, a custom which has prevailed from the foundation of the Government, especially when added to what I said about the superior advantage in the estimation of the laborer which Government service affords. Why, sir, it will demoralize the private labor in the neighborhood where Government has any work going on. No private contractor there who undertakes a job either of stone or brick work, or any other kind of work, such as the Government is having done, can get the same quantity of labor the Government gets without paying the same wages. Private contractors can not compete with the Government in purse.

The great masses of the people do not want this thing. It is only the claim agents who want it. I served on the Committee on Education and Labor in the Forty-sixth Congress. I was brought in contact with these claim agents. It is simply claim agents and doctrinaires who ask for this bill.

Mr. LAMB. Does the gentleman know any of these claims are in the hands of claim agents?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have internal evidence entirely satisfactory to myself, and have had ever since I served on the Committee on Labor in the Forty-sixth Congress, that most of them are.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for information; because if they are I do not vote for this bill. I wish the gentleman to give us information on the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have answered the gentleman as fully as I propose to, and I appeal to his common sense. At best the Government can only employ a few thousand or tens of thousands of laborers and mechanics at a time. Now, if they are to be paid 25 per cent. more than private laborers for the same time in the same sort of work, pray tell me if the other twelve or fifteen million of laborers in this country are willing to work and sweat in the hot sun for ten or twelve hours a day to earn taxes for paying ten hours' wages for eight hours' work to Government pets.

Mr. LYMAN. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

Mr. TILLMAN. This bill, I say again, was drafted and is prosecuted here by claim agents and doctrinaires; men who are too lazy to work, too proud to beg, and too cowardly to steal for fear of the penitentiary; who think that the world owes them a living; that stir about among the men of strong arms but weak heads to persuade them that they ought not to work for more than eight hours a day under any circumstances.

Mr. GLASCOCK. If it will not interfere with the gentleman's argument I would like to state to him that I do not know how it may be in reference to other States, but in regard to my own State, and especially in reference to the Mare Island navy-yard, where the Government employs from 600 to 1,200 laborers, these recommendations and petitions do not emanate from claim agents; but from my own personal knowledge they come from the employés of the Government themselves. I have been solicited time and again by the Government employés there to aid in the passage of this act and in pursuance of the ends of justice.

Mr. TILLMAN. How do you know but that the claim agents and doctrinaires have not themselves induced such recommendations?

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me interrupt the gentleman from South Carolina to ask if he is able to state about how much money this bill will carry?

Mr. TILLMAN. About $30,000,000 is my lowest estimate from the best investigation I could give it after close study and calculation.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose if the bill is passed they will incorporate the lines necessary to appropriate that sum from the Treasury.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is a provision of the bill already.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I must decline to be interrupted any more.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is no such provision in the bill. It will be necessary then to make the appropriation if the bill is passed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Ah, but the bill says that the Government shall pay the judgments which may be obtained in the Court of Claims.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the judgments are appropriated for when they come in here. Now, I claim that the bill ought to show the amount it will take.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know, but if the bill is passed that fixes the amount that will be required to meet the judgments.

Mr. HISCOCK. But I think the bill on its face ought to show precisely the amount appropriated and the sum of money to be expended under it. That is all I am after. I want the bill to show for itself what it does.

Mr. TILLMAN. A. B. Mullett was formerly Supervising Architect. He was at the head of the architectural bureau when all the 15 per cent. contract compensation rascality was going on, but he tried to prevent it. He tried to defy the eight-hour law as a mandatory statute, but there were influences around him that prevented it. I want to read to the House an extract from Mullett's testimony before a committee of the House to show how he regarded these claims for compensation under this eight-hour act and what he thought of the men who presented them. I never read a speech on this floor, as you all know, but shall read from his testimony, taken before the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in 1874, and which will be found in House Report 390, first session Forty-third Congress, pages 3, 5, 7, and 8:

That the real workmen of the country do not want any legislation on hours of labor or rate of wages. * * * On the contrary, they want to see the public works progress, and they want to see appropriations for them. They are glad to get employment on them and give no trouble. * * * When work was commenced on the New York post-office, it was necessary to keep the men working night and day. They worked with calcium lights and were perfectly willing to work ten hours a day, with the understanding that they were to receive a day's pay. * * * The hostility to this eight-hour law, in the different cities and among private contractors is much more intense than the committee has any idea of. * * * There is an antagonism on every job between the employés of contractors and the employés of the Government. They taunt each other and quarrel, and in a few instances violence has been used.

When asked from whom does the ill-feeling come about the non-enforcement of the "eight-hour" law, Mullet replied:

From the organized officers of these working associations, who do not do a day's work themselves, but who are living on the hard earnings of others. Men who wander around the country organizing strikes. * * * These paid perambulators when they find work has been carried on by the Government which interferes in a slight degree with some of their theories, send one or two men and get them put upon the work, and in a day or two there is a strike. * * * There is no trouble with workingmen or mechanics. It is only with these perambulators, who do no work themselves. There never has been any difficulty between me and the mechanics. * * * Mr. Graham, of New York, who made this claim first for extra pay (two hours under the eight-hour law) on the New York post-office was an officer of a trades-union and known to be such. He got upon the work long enough to make a claim, which was in my opinion all he wanted.

You see, Mr. Chairman, a portion of the work in all departments of the Government has been done heretofore and will have to be done hereafter by contract and a portion by per diem labor under officers of the Government. And the then Supervising Architect tells you there was the bitterest rivalry, envy, jealousy, and jeers, and even violence, in the cases under his observation.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is from Mullet?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is from Mullet. It is backed by common sense. It is backed by all the records of the Government. Everything proclaims that he spoke the truth.

Mr. COX, of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Presently; not now.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is a very significant question.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is not the first law that has been passed by a Government undertaking to regulate the hours of labor and the rate of wages for men. It has been tried in England and elsewhere again and again and again. You will find such acts on the statute-books of every old State in this Union. But they are dead letters. Michigan passed such an act a few years ago. I would like to ask any member from Michigan who may be within the sound of my voice if that act is not entirely obsolete now. Why, sir, government can no more regulate the hours of labor and the rate of wages than it can regulate when a man shall eat and how much; what he shall wear and how long he shall wear it, or what sort of a house he shall live in. It is nothing but a sumptuary regulation when a government undertakes to enact a mandatory law in such matters for men. Women and children ought to be protected by law against overwork in factories, but let grown men be their own guardians! Must a young man work no more than an old one if he wants to work? Must a married man work no more than a single one if he wishes to support his wife and children decently? Must a strong man toil no more than a feeble one if he has any ambition to improve his physical condition? Then why deny him the privilege of contracting to work ten or twelve hours if he prefers to do so during the six summer months? It is absurd to talk about denying him the privilege.

The eight-hour act was either conceived in fraud to carry a Presidential election or to commit a peculation on the Treasury under the 15 per cent. conspiracy; for it was nothing else but a conspiracy; or, as I have said, it was a mere declaratory law, deciding what should be a proper measure of time for a day's labor; nothing more. It was never intended to be mandatory.

Mr. COX, of New York. Why do you not repeal it or execute it?

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman asks why not repeal or execute the act? I say in reply, why not repeal or execute the law that declares sixty minutes an hour or sixty seconds a minute?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. CASSIDY took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, had further insisted on its amendment No. 35 disagreed to by the House, agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. LOGAN, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. RANSOM.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 585) granting a pension to William Reinhardt; and

A bill (H. R. 6761) respecting a bridge at Tonawanda, in the State of New York.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate (S. 25) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decisions of questions arising thereon, and requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HOAR, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. PUGH.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 2246) to provide for the purchase of additional land for the uses of the public building in the city of New Bedford, State of Massachusetts; and

A bill (S. 2321) for the relief of Bessie S. Gilmore.

The message further announced that the Senate requested the return by the House of Senate bill 315, granting a pension to William Reinhardt.

Mr. KEIFER. The request of the Senate for the return of a bill should be concurred in at once.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee rose informally only to receive a message, not to transact any business.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6541) relative to the eight-hour law.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. I did not expect to speak on this matter. I simply desire to say I hope the House will pass this bill. So long as this law exists we ought to execute it.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I inquire of my colleague if he does not think it would be fair to put in the bill an appropriation of money to pay these claims?

Mr. COX, of New York. I have not been on the appropriations business as much as my friend.

Mr. HISCOCK. You have been on the Appropriations Committee with me. You know you can not pay a cent of these claims until the law is passed making the appropriation.

Mr. COX, of New York. I presume a fair adjudication of these claims before the proper tribunal will show how much is due to men for their work, and I would pay to the last dollar a quantum meruit for men who have worked for the Government, according to the law as it is now on the statute-book. My friend from Kentucky says that my colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] voted to lay on the table a law such as he now commends to me. I do not know how that is.

Mr. HISCOCK. Who is the gentleman's friend from Kentucky?

Mr. WILLIS (rising). I plead guilty to the charge of being the one who made the suggestion to the gentleman from New York. If the gentleman wants any better record, here it is [holding up a volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD].

Mr. HISCOCK. I never find fault with my record. I only say this: I believe any law which creates a claim against the Government ought to carry in it a direct appropriation of money to pay claims.

Mr. MORSE. You do not know what is the amount.

Mr. HISCOCK. Put in enough to cover the amount. If that sum is required put in $30,000,000.

Mr. MORSE. That amount may not be required.

Mr. HISCOCK. You can put in enough, and then say "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. STORM. Would not that defeat the bill?

Mr. HISCOCK. If it defeats the bill to place in it that it takes that amount from the Treasury, it should defeat it. That is my point exactly.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have not any idea but what my colleague would vote to defeat this bill if he could, directly or indirectly.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, I beg your pardon. But I say this: I will under no circumstances vote for the bill unless it carries an appropriation to pay the claims it creates against the Government. Then I will know it will not be a bill which the Committee on Appropriations can defeat at the next session of Congress by refusing to appropriate the money to pay the claims. I have seen as you have seen in this House hundreds of thousands of dollars struck this session from the deficiency bill that have been adjudicated by the Treasury Department, and a refusal on the part of the House to appropriate the money to pay them. I do not want any more of those scenes enacted.

Mr. COX, of New York. And I do not want any more of my time taken up. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] seeks to avoid the force of the law by saying that it provides only a rule of direction for the executive officers of the Government; that it is directory only. I submit that the rule as to ministerial officers is, that wherever a line of action is pointed out for them they are bound to that line of action, without any discretion upon their part. Whatever may be said of the law there is in it no quality which invites or permits its violation.

What do these people ask? They invoke the constitutional guarantee of every man that they shall not be deprived of property without due process of law. They simply ask that a judgment which has been rendered against this Government by confession may be enforced, and they ask for legal process to enforce it.

The gentleman from South Carolina says: "You can have your judgment, but you can not have an execution of the judgment," and the reason he urges is peculiar. He expressed it in this language: "If this bill should pass, it would inaugurate a raid upon the public Treasury equaled only by that which would result from a repeal of the arrearages-of-pension act; second, if this money be paid it would not go into the hands of the people who render the service, but into the hands of their agents and attorneys."

The first objection amounts to this: "We will not pay you what we owe you, because we would rather keep our money in our pockets;" and the second objection amounts to this: "We will not pay you what we owe you because we do not like some of the people to whom some portion of it may go."

Well, now, Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who are alarmed at a raid upon the public Treasury which may result from the repeal of the arrearages-of-pension act.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to explain what I mean?

Mr. LAIRD. After I get through.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can do it in half a minute.

Mr. LAIRD. I have not time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know the gentleman would not misrepresent me, but I fear he has misconstrued me.

Mr. LAIRD. I have only got four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL].

Mr. ROCKWELL. On June 25, 1868, the following became the law of the land:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed, or who may be hereafter employed, by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. (15 Statutes at Large, 77.)

In view of this law, on May 19, 1869, President Grant directed—

That from and after this date no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics on account of such reduction of the hours of labor. (16 Statutes at Large, 1127.)

Again on May 11, 1872, President Grant issued another proclamation, referring to the law and the first proclamation and the fact that they had "not been strictly observed by all officers of the Government having charge of such laborers, workmen, and mechanics," and again called attention to the law, and directed "all officers of the executive department of the Government having charge of the employment and payment of laborers, workmen, or mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States to make no reduction in the wages paid by the Government, by the day, to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, on account of the reduction of the hours of labor." (17 Statutes at Large, 955.)

An act was passed by Congress May 18, 1872, the second section of which was as follows:

That the proper accounting officers be, and hereby are, authorized and required, in the settlement of all accounts for the services of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work, for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the 19th day of May, 1869, the date of the proclamation of the President concerning such pay, to settle and pay for the same without reduction on account of reduction of hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Then came the case of the United States, appellant, vs. Arthur Martin, No. 401, October term, 1876, in the Supreme Court of the United States; and see Martin vs. United States, 4 Otto, 400–404.

Then followed, on June 30, 1877, General Order No. 227, issued by the Secretary of the Navy, referring to that decision, and the basis of labor was fixed at ten hours a day. Then came the petitions to the Departments and a review of the matter. On March 26, 1883, the Secretary of the Navy ordered the enforcement of the eight-hour law at all navy-yards. During the present year orders have been issued in the War Department bringing the practice in accord with the law.

Practically, then, both the Navy and War Departments now admit the construction of the law of 1868 that the "workmen, laborers, and mechanics" employed by the Government have all along claimed. It now remains to do justice by the men who have during these years worked overtime in excess of the eight hours required to constitute a day's work.

This bill allows claims for labor in excess of eight hours per day performed for the Government to be presented to the Court of Claims, to be adjudicated upon the basis that eight hours constitute a day's work. That proposition would seem to be a fair one. The law made eight hours a day's labor. The men have been often obliged to work more, or practically to lose their places. Under the construction of the law of 1868, as now agreed upon, the men have worked overtime and should be paid for that overtime. Their case is a just one.

It is said here that unless some appropriation is placed at the end of this bill these men will never recover anything. I ask gentlemen not to vote against the bill on that ground. We are willing to take a judgment against the United States, and trust to the honor, the honesty, and the integrity of future Congresses if we can not collect these claims under the law as presented here.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman before he takes his seat allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I had only three minutes, and I suppose that time has about expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I want some gentleman to answer me.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER].

Mr. WELLER. It is a fair statement that the laborer is worthy of his hire. As I understand this bill the laborer is only seeking to get what he is justly entitled to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I know the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. WELLER. I will, but not now. The laboring man is seeking to recover for labor that he was compelled by virtue of existing conditions to perform beyond the eight hours prescribed by the law.

Labor creates all the wealth there is except that which the First Great Cause scatters on every side. I am one of those who are willing to do all that we can to give to labor a part of that which it produces and not permit the capitalists and monopolists to absorb it all.

It was but a few weeks ago that there was scarcely a dissenting voice on this floor to an unlimited appropriation to fit out ships and man them and send them to the North Pole, or in that direction, to search for parties who had gone there to look for that which no sane man ever ought to have gone on such an expedition for. Yet when labor comes to the door of this House and asks that it be paid for the toil it has performed over and above the hours prescribed by law, we hear objections raised on every hand. I hope gentlemen who have made such objections will not carry them to the extent of a vote if we shall have a recorded vote, and I hope this vote will be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Now, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. This is a very simple proposition. Either there is or there is not a law known as the eight-hour law. If there is an eight-hour law, it has some meaning. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] contends that it had no meaning.

Mr. TILLMAN. I never contended any such thing. The Supreme Court of the United States in two decisions has declared the same thing that I contended for.

Mr. WILLIS. In answer to that I will say that not only did the debate at the time the law was passed disclose the meaning of that law, but Congress by two solemn acts, one in 1872 and one in 1880, has declared the meaning of the law. In 1872 Congress passed an act appropriating money to pay the difference between the wages for eight hours and ten hours a day.

Mr. TILLMAN. For what length of time?

Mr. WILLIS. Between the 25th of June, 1868, the date of the original act, and the time of the President's proclamation.

Mr. TILLMAN. For ten months and twenty-four days. Why did not Congress appropriate money to pay up to date?

Mr. WILLIS. Then, on the 14th of June, 1880, the House by a two-third vote, which I have before me, 130 to 51, passed a bill declaring "that according to the true intent and meaning of section 3738 of the Revised Statutes," which is the eight-hour law, "all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government shall hereafter receive a full day's pay for eight hours' work; and all heads of Departments, officers, and agents of the Government are hereby directed to enforce said law as herein interpreted."

When that bill was before the Senate of the United States, Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, then a Senator, being opposed to the bill, gave his meaning of the original act by moving to amend the title of the bill so that it should read as follows:

A bill to give Government employés 25 per cent. more wages than employés of private establishments receive.

That was the opinion which he then had of the law. His amendment had no sense in it unless the law meant to give those Government employés for eight hours' work the pay received by those around them who worked ten hours a day.

Mr. STORM. That amendment was not adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. The amendment, I am glad to say, was rejected by a two-third vote, because it was a "rider," designed for the purpose of killing the bill. Now, the reason for the passage of this law was not, I beg to say to gentlemen, a demagogical one. Mr. Hendricks, then a Senator, now an honored citizen of Indiana, stated:

The extent of this law is not very large, because it reaches only to those who are employed by the Government of the United States, but, as is suggested, it may be very valuable as an example. Its influence upon the private employments of the country may be beneficial to the laboring classes. My opinion is that eight hours of labor are enough, and that the health of the laborer and the general interests of society will be promoted by this reform.

Now, will any man with this debate before him say that this eight-hour law was merely declaratory——

Mr. TILLMAN. Has not the Supreme Court said so; and is not the Supreme Court the proper organ to construe a statute?

Mr. WILLIS. The Supreme Court has not so decided.

Mr. TILLMAN. Here is the decision, which will verify what I say:

Mr. WILLIS. The case of Martin, to which the gentleman has referred, was decided upon the single fact that Martin had forfeited his right by accepting the wages and signing the receipt. The gentleman knows that this was the pivotal point in that case.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know no such thing. On the contrary, three out of the four points in the syllabus of the case go directly to the merits of the eight-hour law.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not care anything about the "silly" part; I come to the "bus."

Mr. TILLMAN. If the gentleman will read the decision he will see I am right.

Mr. WILLIS. I refer to the decision of the Court of Claims——

Mr. TILLMAN. Here is the decision of the Supreme Court, in 4 Otto.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that matter. Martin brought suit in the Court of Claims. The case was appealed from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court. Now the Supreme Court, in this decision, says:

In the case before us the claimant continued his work, after understanding that eight hours would not be accepted as a day's labor, but that he must work twelve hours, as he had done before. He received his pay of $2.50 a day, for the work of twelve hours a day as a calendar day's work during the period in question, without protest or objection. At that time ordinary laborers under the same Government received $1.75 per day at the same place, and those engaged in the same department with the claimant in a private establishment, at the same place, received but $2 for a day's work of twelve hours, and the finding adds, "they had more work to do than the claimant had when similarly employed." The claimant's contract was a voluntary and reasonable one, by which he must now be bound.

The evidence shows—and if I had time I could demonstrate this from the report of the case in the Court of Claims—that Martin was called before the superintendent of the work at Annapolis and stated that the officials would not execute the law, and he voluntarily consented to enter into a specific contract and agreed to receive pay for only eight hours' work. So that the case went off on the fact that he had signed away his right. The Court of Claims stated that if he had not signed away his right his case could have stood.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Supreme Court never said that.

Mr. WILLIS. The Supreme Court did say so; and with the permission of the House I will incorporate in my remarks as published these decisions showing that they were made not on the ground that there was no such law or that it had no meaning, but because the man had put himself in a position where he could not take advantage of the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Which is the superior authority, the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court?

Mr. WILLIS. They are both to the same point in this case.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] asks to print with his remarks some decisions. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to address the House upon this measure; but some observations have been made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] which I think demand an answer. He said, among other things, that this was a "claim-agents' bill." He said the bill was drafted by claim agents and was prosecuted by claim agents. My understanding is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] drew this bill.

A MEMBER. Not this bill.

Mr. FORAN. The original bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. This bill is a substitute.

Mr. FORAN. And I am not aware that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is the agent or attorney of any claim agent. I am a member of the committee that reported this bill; and I saw no claim agent before that committee. No claim agent interviewed me about this bill. No person whom I knew to be a claim agent ever spoke to me about the bill. I am not aware that any claim agent spoke to any member of the committee about the bill. I do not believe there is any truth in the allegation of the gentleman from South Carolina; and I hardly think he meant to say what he did.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I said that I was brought in contact with claim agents as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor in the Forty-sixth Congress, and had abundant internal evidence satisfactory to myself that claim agents were behind this thing pressing it.

Mr. FORAN. When the gentleman said, however, that this identical bill, the bill before this House, was a "claim agents' bill," I take it as a reflection upon the committee that reported it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I meant no such reflection.

Mr. WILLIS. I was a member of the same committee to which the gentleman from South Carolina has referred, was equally interested with him in this measure, and I never heard of any claim agent in connection with it.

Mr. TILLMAN. This bill is a substitute for the one introduced by the gentleman from New York, and it entirely omits the last section of that bill, which provides that laborers and mechanics when employed by the Government shall not work more than eight hours except in emergencies, and then shall be paid for the extra labor. Why did the committee omit that provision?

Mr. FORAN. I only desire to say to the House in all candor and sincerity that so far as I know no claim agent has approached the committee that reported this bill. I want that fact distinctly understood.

The gentleman from South Carolina also stated that he had great fears that this eight-hour law, if enforced by Government officials, would create dissension in the vicinity of the navy-yards and arsenals; that among laborers employed by private individuals dissatisfaction would be created. Now I wish to state what I understand to be the object of the eight-hour law and the principle involved in it, and the gentleman perhaps understands it as well as I do. The Government of the United States has a right to say what number of hours its employés shall work. The advocates of the eight-hour law claim, and I claim now, that the reduction of a man's hours of labor from ten to eight hours does not reduce production; that a man can accomplish as much in eight hours' labor as in ten; that thus there is left to the laborer two hours which he would not otherwise have, for reading, recreation, and self-improvement. That is the object of the eight-hour law. If the gentleman from South Carolina is opposed to that principle, I would like to have him so state.

If private individuals employing labor will conform to the principle of the eight-hour law there will be no dissatisfaction among their employés. I am not myself captious as to the matters contained in this bill about paying those persons who have been defrauded by Government officials out of their just rights, but I wish the principle established. This Government passed this law. It meant exactly what the law stated, that eight hours should constitute a day's labor and carry with it a full day's wages. I wish that principle established by this bill, so that the heads of Departments hereafter will find no excuse for not enforcing the law.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] referred to the act of 1862 and said it was still in force. The law of 1868, known as the eight-hour law, is in conflict with the law of 1862. I understand it has always been a rule of law that where two statutes are passed on the same subject, and are inconsistent with each other, the latter act prevails and repeals by implication the former act. I have no doubt that is a correct principle and applies to the acts in question.

I wish to say if these men, who are making this claim are entitled to the money for which this bill provides, then it should be paid to them. If it is right they shall have it I do not care whether it requires an appropriation of one or of ten millions of dollars. If it is due to them they ought to have it. If they have been defrauded out of it that is no reason why we should not do them justice now.

Besides, sir, the men who appeared before the committee were employés of the navy-yards of Philadelphia, New York, and Brooklyn—all men directly interested in this matter.

Before I take my seat I desire to refer to a matter which occurred here the other day, as bearing upon this question. During the time the bill was up for debate to prevent the importation of foreign labor under contract, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] took occasion to say, although I did not hear him say it, and I believe he did not say it then, although it appears in the RECORD:

> The Democratic party is utterly disqualified and disabled by its whole constitution, history, and traditions from consistently and rationally handling this great question of free labor.

Had I heard any such remark I would have replied to it at the time. I desire to say now, notwithstanding the measure before the House at that time was called for by the exigencies of the country, the Republican party, to which the gentleman from Michigan belongs, although in power during the Forty-seventh Congress, never made any attempt to pass such a bill. The gentleman himself never undertook to introduce such a measure during this session, although if he read the papers he must have known it was called for by every one interested in labor in the United States.

He said further:

> Had this bill originated among those who have piloted the path of the empire of free labor on this continent, among those accustomed to deal thoughtfully with these great industrial and economic questions, I believe it would have been more skillfully drawn and less amenable to criticism.

It may possibly be Democratic gentlemen on this side do not know anything about economic science, but I will tell the gentleman we will not go to the school of which the gentleman was principal or president to learn it.

I will only say, in conclusion, so far as I understand the principles of the Democratic party, that party has always been friendly to free labor in this country from its inception as a party by its great founder, Thomas Jefferson, down to the present time. I do know that the late President Garfield, a great leader of the Republican party, in a speech made in 1865 on this floor, declared that the fame of Thomas Jefferson was waning and that of Alexander Hamilton waxing and that we were gravitating toward a stronger Government. If that is the principle of the party to which the gentleman belongs—the principle of monarchical government as embodied in Alexander Hamilton—he is entitled to all the credit and glory he can get out of it.

I yield now to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] to finish his remarks.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, when my time expired I was saying that for one I see no especial reason for alarm on account of the repeal of the arrearages-of-pension act to which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] called the attention of the House.

Mr. TILLMAN. I meant nothing offensive by it. I only alluded to the quantity of money the arrearages-of-pension act drew from the Treasury and the dread surprise with which everybody found it took ten times as much as it was anticipated at the time the law was passed it would. I referred to it in that sense, and not in any offensive sense.

Mr. LAIRD. I wish to assure the gentleman from South Carolina that I shall attempt to make no unwarranted use of his allusion, so far as I understand myself, simply this: if it should follow that the surplus in the Treasury should be depleted by the amount named to be taken therefrom to settle arrearages of pensions I should not be alarmed, and for this reason: if a right to recover shall be established against this Government, either as arising from its failure to pay arrearages to those to whom it owes pensions or from its failure to pay the charge for labor in excess of the law to those to whom that charge may be due, the only argument that this could furnish to the opponents of the bill would be that it should not become a law, not because it is not right and proper and equitable and just, but that it shall not become a law on account of the quantum of recovery which will follow upon its enactment. That is equal to saying that if we could pay our debts without embarrassment to ourselves we would pay them, but if we could not pay them without embarrassment, then we will not pay them.

What, Mr. Speaker, is to follow upon the passage of this act? Simply an appeal to the courts. If it shall be true, as contended by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the courts have already adjudicated the question presented by the bill, then the court to which they appeal is bound by that decision, and the Government can sustain no harm.

But it is argued that this matter is already res adjudicata. An appeal is made to the Martin case, decided in 4 Otto, and what is known as the Driscoll case. I submit now to the House upon a careful examination of these cases, that it does not appear anywhere that the question of the right of a laborer to recover a full day's pay for the performance of eight hours' work has ever been passed upon by the Supreme Court or in any way alluded to.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will allow me to read three lines from this case decided by the Court of Claims it will carry out the views expressed:

> Whatever benefits the eight-hour law might have brought upon the claimant while employed at the Naval Academy he neglected to avail himself of, and has waived and lost by his own acts, and can not recover in this action.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is a decision of the Court of Claims. There are two opinions of the Supreme Court that overrule it.

Mr. LAIRD. There can be no danger to this Government from the opening of the doors of the courts to those who shall have claims against it to that arbitrament, just as individuals we submit all our rights; and shall we hold back from submitting those of the Government which we represent?

To one who has seen as little of the administration of public affairs as a new member of this body many things strike one with absolute astonishment. A policy adopted by a private individual similar to that adopted by this Government would devote him in almost no time to infamy. If we owe a debt we must answer, and if we refuse to answer, then comes the court, the judgment, the execution, and seizure of the property, and the end.

A review of the policy of this Government——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAIRD. Not now; I have but a very brief time.

A review of the policy of this Government must strike one, I say, with astonishment. Over one hundred years ago the policy was settled that the Government should answer for damages suffered upon the frontier by losses from the raids of hostile Indians, and yet I am told that there are accumulated cases proved according to the formulas of the law, under the direction of the Interior Department, amounting to almost $100,000,000 unanswered for.

The same thing may be said with reference to the French spoliation claims; and the same policy marks the administration of the foreign affairs of the Government. Hundreds of claimants interested in the Japanese indemnity fund are cut off by the repayment to the Government of Japan of over $1,000,000, while these claimants, the people to whom the fund was due, are left, so far as the Government is concerned, to starve, and there is no redress for them.

The same policy marks the administration of the postal affairs of the Government. Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact that all over the Western section of this country the postmasters and the employés in the various post-offices are working unheard-of hours and receiving no consideration for it.

The postmasters in many instances are compelled to pay the rent of the buildings used by the Government for the post-offices and other expenses out of their salaries as well as the sums required for the employment of people necessary for the distribution and management of the mails, and yet the Government and its courts refuse to compensate these people for their labor even.

The Government day by day reaps the fruit of their toil. It is invested for the good of the Government. And when they come to knock at the doors of Congress asking for relief what answer do they receive? One gentleman says it will open the doors of the Treasury to a raid like that which would follow upon the repeal of the arrearages-of-pensions act. Another gentleman says the money would not go into the hands of those who earned it. And so upon one pretext or another these people are deferred, delayed, and everlastingly defeated in the recovery of their rights. I desire to ask gentlemen this: You represent the Government; you represent these people. Is it not right you should intervene between the two and see that exact justice is done?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. GLASCOCK].

Mr. GLASCOCK. I have listened with considerable interest to the discussion of this question; and I must say it has taken a very wide range. We do not seem to be discussing the fact as to whether the measure passed by Congress should be carried into effect; but we have gone to the merits of the original question itself. We are no longer discussing the question as it is presented to the House under this bill, but we have been discussing the merits of the eight-hour act. I insist that that has nothing to do with the matter under consideration.

I am in favor of the eight-hour act. I believe it a wise, beneficent, and sanatory act passed by a beneficent Government for the improvement of the people who work for that Government. But that has nothing to do with this question. The question before us is simply whether that act should be carried into effect.

Now, what is this eight-hour law? What was it passed for? Was it intended to be a mere nullity? Was it intended to have no operative effect? Or was it intended there should be some effect given to it? I submit that the general rule of construction should apply in this case as in all others, and that where a solemn declaration has been made by a deliberative body on a given subject it is to be understood something is meant by that act and something is to be effected by it.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GLASCOCK. I have only five minutes, but I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. OATES. If the eight-hour law is a good one on account of its sanatary effect in preventing employés from working too much, are you not violating the spirit of that law by encouraging them to work ten or twelve hours a day?

Mr. TILLMAN. By offering them a premium.

Mr. GLASCOCK. As I said before, the discussion of that question has nothing to do with the discussion of the pending question. And I wanted to get away from that and to show that too wide a latitude had been taken in the discussion here.

What I wanted to say was that this law is to be carried into effect or is to be decided a nullity. Which? I understand the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who made such an able argument on the subject a short time ago, has taken the ground that it amounts really to nothing under the decision of the Supreme Court; that the Supreme Court has gone to the extent of saying that where a contract is entered into between the Government and the employé that contract should be respected. That, I understand, is the Martin case.

Every case, sir, is to be examined upon the facts presented. Every lawyer upon the floor of this House knows that all else than is embraced within the certain scope of facts presented in a particular case is immaterial. Now I maintain the Martin case decides nothing more or less than this, that where an officer of the Government has cut down the hours, say from ten to eight, and a corresponding cut down has been made in the wages, and a subordinate of his says, "We will work additional time for an additional amount," and the officer says, "No, you can work at the rate we have fixed or you can take your discharge," and he accepts that, works, gives his receipt for the money, and goes into the Court of Claims for the adjudication of the question, then they have a right to say that under this existing state of facts he can claim nothing of the Government and is entitled to nothing.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman explain why this attempts new legislation? It says the eight-hour law shall be amended. If the eight-hour law as it now stands is a mandatory statute by itself, why does this bill propose to amend that law and amend it retroactively?

Mr. GLASCOCK. I do not know what was in the mind of the committee; but I can tell the gentleman what is in my mind and why I support the bill. I would do so as I would support a contract between individuals under a general law. For instance, take a familiar illustration. The interest law of a State may say the rate of interest shall be 6 or 8 per cent., and that up to the limit of usury you may establish any rate of interest by private contract. But in this case it is different. Here one of the contracting parties enacts a law which should bind that contracting party. I understand that the doctrine of estoppel ought to run against the United States in this, that when the United States has said eight hours shall constitute a single day's work the subordinates of the Government ought not to be allowed to say to the employés under them, under threat of dismissal, "You shall work ten hours or take your walking ticket."

I am heartily in favor of the tenor of this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 6542) granting a pension to Harriet S. Brisbine.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

Mr. FORAN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], and will then return the control of the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, I do not know that I would participate in this discussion if it was not that the principle upon which the original eight-hour law was based is brought in question here. In fact the perpetuity of that law rests upon your action here to-day. As I understand it this bill is a bill to practically enforce the eight-hour law.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is an amendment to the eight-hour law; it is new legislation.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It ought to be new legislation. All I regret is that there is not a law of this country which would take hold of the heads of Departments when they fail to carry out a law passed by Congress and punish them for their failure to obey the laws of the country.

Here is a law which was passed in 1868 and yet remained a dead letter by the failure of the heads of Departments to enforce it until the President by his proclamation caused it to be enforced. It was enforced from the time of the issuance of that proclamation, May 19, 1869, until 1876—until the pious Hayes came into power. During the whole of his administration and until 1882 it remained a dead letter, although in May, 1872, an act was passed by Congress to pay claims that arose between June 25, 1868, when the original act was passed, and March 19, 1869, the date of the President's proclamation.

The act then remained a dead letter until March 19, 1883, when the Secretary of the Navy saw fit to have it enforced in the navy-yards, and last fall the Secretary of War caused it to be enforced in the arsenals. Abandoned without a reason in 1876, its enforcement is resumed seven years later. It is possible that the approach of a Presidential election may have been the galvanic battery to bring back to life this apparently dead law.

It is charged here to-day that workingmen do not ask for the enforcement of this law. Will the gentleman making this statement name any labor organization in this country which condemns the eight-hour law? I know of none. On the contrary, ever since its enactment they have consistently and persistently demanded its practical enforcement; and the principle of this bill is just as much a vital question in American politics to-day as it was the day the law was passed. There is not a labor convention that meets anywhere in the United States that does not adopt as one of the leading planks in its platform of principles "the practical enforcement of the eight-hour law." And yet we are told that this is a mere bubble raised by doctrinaires. Its resurrection after seven years' sleep by the present Administration shows plainly the strength of the demand for its enforcement. The reasons that caused its enactment in 1868 are more cogent to-day than they were then. At that time it was believed that our Republic rested upon the intelligence of the people and that eight hours' labor in the mechanical pursuits, and in all other branches of labor, was quite sufficient; that the residue of the time could well be devoted to the improvement of the mind and social faculties; and that all American citizens should be enabled to devote some portion of their time to the cultivation of the intellect.

It only affected those employed by the Government, but the example thus set it was believed would have great influence in the private employments throughout the country and result in great benefit to the working classes.

I will read a few extracts from the Senate proceedings at the time of its passage that are as applicable now as they were then.

Senator Hendricks said:

> My opinion is that eight hours of labor faithfully applied are quite sufficient, and that the health of the laborer and the general interests of society will be promoted by this reform.

Senator Stewart:

> I believe it is admitted on all hands that men will do more work per hour if they work eight hours than they will if they work ten hours a day.

Senator Cole said:

> Unless the people are provided by law with some protection against the requirement which is now put upon them by the exorbitant demands of capitalists, they will not be so well prepared to perform the duties of American citizenship. I am therefore very anxious for the passage of this bill.

Senator Conness:

> I know that labor, like every other commodity, must depend upon the demand and supply. But I, for one, will be glad when the industry of the country shall become accommodated to a reduced number of hours in the performance of labor.

My time will not permit of further quotations. If, when this law went into effect, the Government through its various departments had carried it out in good faith, its benign influence would have been felt ere this in the home of every workman, and they would not be to-day asking for the enforcement of a law enacted for the people by their representatives and dishonored by the various administrations.

The marvelous growth of labor-saving machinery, displacing each year workmen by the thousands; the exactions of selfish capital, which ignores every principle of mental improvement or needed rest to their workmen—are to-day powerful arguments for the renewal of this question, which I believe will again become the vital issue in politics to American workmen.

Believing that the Government justly owes the money to these men for over-time under the eight-hour law, and that it should live up to and carry out the law, I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the committee now rise in order to limit the debate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would inquire how much of the time consumed in the discussion of this proposition has been accorded to those who do not exactly see their way clear to vote for this bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that one hour has been occupied by those opposed to the bill and something over an hour in favor of it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would be glad if the time for general discussion could be extended a little longer. We can perhaps do nothing else this afternoon than consider this bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman may accomplish what he desires by availing himself of the discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Hardly, unless I should get the floor three or four times; twice, at least.

Mr. HOPKINS. So many gentlemen have asked for time that I find it will be impossible to get through the bill to-day unless we rise to close general debate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think it no more than fair that equal time should be accorded to the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the motion will not be agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOPKINS, there were—ayes 66, noes 62.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not want to obstruct business, but unless we can have a little more time for general debate I must raise the question of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. This being a motion that the committee rise, a quorum is not required.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask for tellers. We only want thirty minutes longer.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and Mr. HOPKINS were appointed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana (before the count by tellers was concluded). I have agreed to withdraw the demand for tellers if three-quarters of an hour more be allowed to the gentlemen who oppose the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That arrangement can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] can withdraw the motion that the committee rise, and then the Chair can recognize me with the understanding that after forty-five minutes the motion to rise shall be renewed.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the motion that the committee rise tellers have been ordered; and the motion can not be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FIEDLER. I object.

Mr. HOPKINS. I withdraw the motion that the committee rise as I think we will save time by shortening the debate under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the debate shall be limited to forty-five minutes.

Mr. DEUSTER. I object.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I renew my motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. DEUSTER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the general debate is limited to forty-five minutes, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the eight-hour law, like all other statutes, ought to be enforced, and if this bill simply contemplates its enforcement it ought not be opposed by any gentleman who has regard for the supremacy of the law.

What is the eight-hour law, and why has it become the rule in Government employment?

The act of June 25, 1868, merely declares as follows:

> That eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed, or who may be hereafter employed, by or on behalf of the Government of the United States; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. (15 Statutes at Large, 77.)

This simply defines a labor day as between the Government and certain of its employés, and in the absence of anything to the contrary declares a service of eight hours to be a day. This act leaves and was obviously intended to leave the laborer free to work as many hours as he desires, and it does not even by implication prohibit the agents of the Government from contracting for a daily service of ten hours or any number of hours. All the law does, and you may give it the most liberal possible construction, is to declare that eight hours shall be a day's labor when the agreement between the contracting parties does not stipulate to the contrary. It was not intended to interfere with the liberty of either the laborer or the Government to freely contract both as to the hours of employment and the measure of compensation. The statute does not attempt the impossible—to make eight hours equal to ten hours—nor does it require the Government to pay for eight hours a sum equal to the market value of ten hours of service. If the employer and the employé mutually stipulate for a day of ten hours no law is violated. If the laborer works two hours over the legal limit fixed for the day and is paid for this extra time, should he complain, and is it either reasonable or fair to exact double pay for this excess? If the laborer by contract either express or implied undertakes to labor for ten hours for an agreed sum he is bound in law and morals by his contract. Who dares deny this? Then why this bill? If the Government under the law owes its workmen a debt it is our duty to give them a remedy—one that is full and complete and that will insure prompt payment.

But there is no debt to be enforced. This bill does nothing if it does not step in to abrogate an agreement between the laborer and the people. It is an attempt to arbitrarily commit us to payment for services already fully compensated. If any legal obligation exists in this case this bill is not necessary. The measure is a peculiar one. It declares the existence of a debt that has no law or contract to support it, and having declared the debt to be due, significantly fails to make any provisions whatever for its payment. If the Government is under any legal obligation to these employés, that obligation should be discharged to the uttermost farthing, even though it took from the treasury $30,000,000.

The Government has kept its contract, and owes nothing.

But, Mr. Chairman, what is the philosophy of this eight-hour law? I know the demand and supply of labor regulate its price, and the theory of limiting a day's labor to a certain number of hours is this, that you thereby diminish the amount of labor in the market and correspondingly increase its price, for as the supply is diminished the demand is increased, and increased demand brings enhanced price. If this rule could be uniform, if it could apply to the whole body of industrial people, I should be glad to see it adopted by the States and rigidly enforced. If it could be so applied I believe it would bring relief, and a large measure of relief, to the work people.

But the first question is, is it practicable? Can it be made uniform? Can it be enforced? Why, every person conversant with our industrial pursuits knows its adoption and enforcement are impossible. The majority of those who labor in the United States work on the farm. They stand behind the plow-handles, they work in the brown corn lands and in the golden harvest fields, and nature, the irrepealable law of the Almighty, exacts that when the genial sunshine of the spring-time comes and the glebe is ready for the plowshare, that the husbandman shall be at his work at that hour when the lark is ready with its matin song. He starts into his work in the first dawn of the day and labors until the night-time comes. Not, if you please, always because he desires as a freeman to do so, but because the necessity of his business demands it. When the harvest-time comes and the crop is ready for the sickle he must go and labor, regardless of the number of hours, in order that he may garner up the fruits of his toil. Practical farming employments exact during the farming season every hour of the day-time, and you can not apply an eight-hour law to the agricultural laborers. To do so is to limit food production, to leave the plow stand still in the furrow and the ripened grain to rot in the fields.

There is another large class of working people who would rebel against a law limiting the hours of their labor. I mean those mechanics who unassisted and on their own account manufacture their wares for the market: the tailor, the blacksmith, the shoemaker, and the thousands of others of like employments. These demand the liberty to work as many hours as they please. As the law can only be applied to a limited number it can effect but little in reducing the supply of labor. This is obvious.

Let us pursue this inquiry further. The theory upon which democratic government is founded is that it is to recognize no special class, and this eight-hour law does grant special favors and creates a little labor aristocracy.

Mr. LYMAN. That is just it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Those who simply happen to be fortunate enough to secure Government employment. Gentlemen come into this House and pronounce panegyrics on this measure who, I have observed, have a navy-yard or arsenal or some governmental institution within their Congressional districts. [Laughter.] I have none in mine; and in behalf of the laborers of the factories, these bronzed men who stand under the scorching suns of the harvest-time and amid the hum of the wheels, these men who stand about the chimneys which send their black smoke heavenward, these men who stand by the glowing fires of the furnaces, I protest that they shall not work ten hours a day for the same measure of compensation that is awarded to these favored Government employés for eight hours of labor. Is it right they should do so? I demand equal pay for equal service. Whatever you may say in regard to the enforcement of this law by the Departments of the Government this is true, and no man dare deny it, that the employés of the Government have received precisely the same measure of compensation that has been given in like employment to persons who have been engaged in manufacturing establishments controlled by private capital. And you gentlemen propose by this special class legislation to give a Government employé who toils in the workshop as much money for eight hours of toil as you pay his fellow-workman, his peer in social life, his equal in ability to ply his art, who happens to be engaged by a private person, for ten hours. I say, do you propose to give the one for eight hours of service as much as his fellow-laborer working near by in the next establishment obtains for ten? That is what I want to know, and that is a plain question. Who will answer it?

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No; you did not permit me to ask you a question to-day.

Mr. WELLER. All right; I will let the country hear it by and by, and don't you forget it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And if I am not very much mistaken the gentleman will hear from the country, or a part of it, before very long. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. And you shall hear from the "gentleman from Iowa" by way of the people.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Now, I have attempted in the first place to show briefly that an eight-hour law, if it could be made uniform and universal, would do much to relieve the laborer. I have attempted to show that it is impossible to make it uniform in its operation, first, because of the fact that certain industries necessarily require a larger number of hours than others and necessitate the extension of the ordinary working hours of the day. I have attempted to show next that the eight-hour law, if it can not be made uniform, tends to create a special class, a favored class of laborers. But there is another thing about it: if it could be made universal it is still an attack upon individual liberty. I say it is only valuable in any event when every laboring man is required by law to conform to it.

If every man was required by a cast-iron statute to conform to the eight-hour rule, if that could be done, I repeat it would be an attack upon individual liberty. Why? As the gentleman from South Carolina has well said, the poor man who has the wife and the children dependent upon him for support has the right to toil so many hours as may be necessary by his industry to provide the genial fire on the hearthstone and to put the necessaries of life on the table. If he can do it by eight hours' labor, let it so be done. But if it requires more, it is his right, ay, more than that, it is his duty to labor longer than that. I go beyond that. I say that even if it were possible for him to accumulate all that the necessities of his family require by his eight hours' labor, yet no government in the universe of God ought to fix that as a limit during which only he shall work. He has not only the right to provide for the necessities of to-day, but he may lay by something for the day of disaster, for the day of adversity that may be hidden in the womb of the future. To-day, in the vigor of his life, he may be able to achieve all that his family requires; but nature has appointed the time when old age must come and when the trembling limbs and the weary frame can labor no longer.

Every man has the right, upon him is the duty, to lay by something for himself and those who are dependent upon him for that time when the evening of his life shall come. Ah! but he may do more than that. There is still another consideration. It is not only his duty to provide for the wants of himself and of his family when the time comes that he may no longer labor, but he may store up his earnings so as to be able to give something to the children that God has given him. He may give them a start in the world. And after all there is no law so good as that irrepealable statute of the Almighty which gave man these hands and the right to use them freely, the right to plant and to water and to pluck; that irreversible law of God which gave man the brain with which to parley and plan and economize. In other words, there is no statute so invaluable to the laborer as is that statute of nature in which is enshrined his individual liberty.

A law fixing inflexibly the time during which a man may toil strikes down that invaluable privilege of a freeman, the liberty to contract. I insist that no rule, no statute, should withhold from any laboring man, however humble, the right to freely engage in any lawful service, and to contract without dictation from any quarter in regard to the terms upon which his labor shall be given. What right have we to play the rôle of master to the work people?

This Government is not a paternal Government. The Government is not the father. It is the servant of the people; that is all. We are not the bosses of the people. We are the mere servants of the people, who stand behind us and behind the Government, which is the creature of their power. The people do not ask us, they do not expect us to give them food, clothing, or houses. They do not ask the Government to support them. They do not expect that except for the unfortunates who are unable to earn these things for themselves. The people expect this: that the Government will give the fullest and the amplest protection to what? To their lives, their liberty, and their property. In other words, the Government is to give them a clear track and let them run the race as swiftly as they may. It is the purpose and end of Government to take from our shoulders the burdens, if any we bear, of class or unequal legislation. It should take all unequal legislation out of the pathway of progress, and make us all peers. The capitalist and the poor man, the employer and the employed, under this democratic system of ours, ought to be peers, and the Government gives us the richest of all possible blessings when it gives us laws that protect everything that is dear to our common nature—our lives, our liberties, and our earnings. That law which protects the millionaire in his wealth and the enjoyment of its blessings, protects the poor laboring man as he goes home from the workshop or the field of toil with his hard-earned dollar. The law that protects the poor man's earnings and leaves him free to work and plan and economize makes it possible for him to take his place in the ranks of the rich.

The same law that allows the rich man to accumulate millions allows the poor man to do it in the same way. It is the same law; it is the law by which property is earned, and by which it is disposed of freely; for if we could not earn it freely and dispose of it freely it would be worthless to us whether it be to the poor or whether it is to the rich. But here there is an idea——

Mr. COX, of New York. Thank God for the idea. [Laughter,]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is very seldom that my friend from New York catches on to an idea; when he does he is inclined to be reverent and thank God for it; for ideas come to him like angels' visits, few and far between. [Laughter.] Although he is not like the Scotchman; it is not necessary to bore an idea into his head with a gimlet.

Mr. COX, of New York. Go on with your speech.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My friend will please not interfere with my speech.

I was about to say that the idea pervades this country that there is some class who are entitled to all the rights, and some other class upon which are imposed all the duties of the Government. It strikes me that this legislation—class legislation, as I regard it—not general legislation applying to all the industrial people, but making a privileged class; it strikes me this legislation is in pursuance of the idea that in this democratic Government rights and duties are not reciprocal, but that there is a fortunate class of somebodies who are entitled to all the rights and privileges of the Government and some other class of unfortunates upon whom are imposed all the duties and responsibilities. Now, I assume that human rights and human liberty are only safe when protected from the encroachments of arbitrary power and the creation of privileged classes. The highest commercial and industrial civilization can be had only in that State where each man is guaranteed the free use of all his powers in the production of the means of subsistence and of wealth.

Now, what is the true theory at least of this labor question? As I have attempted to state briefly, if we are to make a system, if we wish to fashion this into a legislative system, it must be uniform, it must apply to all, it must give equal privileges to all and impose equal responsibilities upon all. Unless that is possible, unless this perfect equality of rights and duties is possible, then there ought to be no legislation upon that subject.

I insist in the second place, to recapitulate what I have attempted to say, that if this uniform rule can not be had, it is because first it can not be made to apply to certain classes of our laboring people, and secondly because it is inhibited by the right, I think the natural right, that gives to every citizen, to every living human being, the liberty to employ his hands or his head for just so many hours as his necessities or his inclinations may require. I think there is no better law and never will be a better law than to strike down every statute that attempts to give to any interest or business any kind of monopoly and allow the whole body of our people to stand upon a platform of perfect equality and each to strive to do the best he can for himself and his family.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. That is good Democratic doctrine.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is Democratic doctrine as the gentleman frankly suggests. Strange things sometimes get into the Democratic platforms.

Mr. COX, of New York. I never heard such a good speech from you in my life.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let me conclude by saying that it is not the function of the Government to make men happy, but only to give them an opportunity by their own effort to become so.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman what the Chicago platform of his own party contains as to the eight-hour law.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not remember what it contains on that subject; nor do I know what the next Chicago platform will have in it. I said in the introduction of this discussion I was in favor of the rigid enforcement of the eight-hour law, as I am for the enforcement of all laws.

Mr. HOPKINS. And yet you are attacking the very principle of the eight-hour law.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not agree with the gentleman on that proposition. If I am attacking the eight-hour law, in the remarks I have been making, it is unfortunate for the eight-hour law. If it is in the way of principle it is no fault of mine.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will you vote for the bill?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will think about it. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE].

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Chairman, in every meritorious contest between labor and capital or any force or combination antagonistic to the real interests of labor I have ever been and ever desire to be upon the side of the latter, and I greatly desire in all my official acts while occupying a seat in this body to so speak and vote upon all questions relating to the laboring classes as to advance their interests and their cause. If I may be pardoned a personal allusion, I will say that by birth, education, and experience I have all my life been identified with the classes who labor and earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, not that I have always toiled as a laborer in the shop or the field, but that life with me has been one of continual and unabated labor from youth until the present moment; and, sir, believing as I do that in our day it has become possible for designing and unprincipled men, backed by the power of large sums of money, to so organize and combine in their purposes and schemes for personal aggrandizement as to perpetrate gross hardships and injustice upon those who are engaged in what is called common labor, I unhesitatingly avow it to be my desire that the Congress of the United States in all matters bearing upon the general labor system of the country shall enact laws for the protection, security, and prosperity of those who now and for generations yet to come shall pass their days in those vocations of life in which the greatest exactions of toil are demanded by the very necessities which compel them to labor. But, sir, while I feel free to make this avowal I am firmly impressed with the conviction that every act of legislation in this direction should be the result of deliberation and wisdom—that, in fact, every law of the nature of the one under consideration should be founded upon principles of right, doing justly by all who may be affected thereby; and if I could bring my mind to regard the measure now under discussion as one thus founded I would cheerfully give it my support; but I do not so regard it, and in its present form I can not support it.

My first impressions of the bill, as I listened to the argument of the gentleman having it in charge [Mr. LOVERING] and to his recital of the history of the so-called eight-hour legislation, were favorable to its passage. It seemed to me that if the Government in years past has violated this law which is now and for a number of years has been upon our statute-books, or has permitted its agents and officers, its heads of Departments, to disregard the law and so manage the affairs of their Departments as to work injustice to a large class of laborers employed by them, the men who were thus employed and compelled to perform more labor per day than the law required have or ought to have such claims against the Government for the value of such time as they have labored in excess of that demanded by the law as are worthy of consideration in the manner proposed by this bill; but as the discussion has progressed and I have given further thought to the subject-matter, I have become settled in the conviction that the bill should be defeated.

During the afternoon I have been led to consider the real purpose and policy of the Government in placing upon the statute-books the enactments to which gentlemen have referred, and one of the questions that has suggested itself to my mind is this: Was it the purpose of the Government in enacting this law that purely financial benefit should result to the classes contemplated, or was it the purpose of the Government to legislate with a view to secure to its employés more time for rest, pleasure, and culture—to say to them "the Government is willing to accept from you eight hours of labor per day, instead of nine, ten, or twelve, and compensate you therefor as for a greater number of hours, leaving to you the balance of the time to be disposed of as you may see proper?"

Now, sir, I believe the policy of Congress was to secure such benefits as I have suggested rather than enlarged pecuniary gain to the classes comprehended by the law. I do not urge, however, that this is by any means an answer to the arguments adduced by the friends of this measure, but that in arriving at our conclusions we should not overlook considerations that bear upon the spirit and true policy of the law. But there are, I think, a number of substantial and satisfactory objections to establishing a precedent for the payment of arrearages of pay to civil employés. What is the fact with reference to this matter? It is alleged here, and I accept the statement as true, that certain heads of Departments have for a number of years violated or permitted the violation of this statute, but that it was largely done by or through a system of special contracts, which in one or more cases have been construed legal by our Supreme Court, and by the terms of which contracts the employés, knowing the law, consented to become parties to its violation.

Now, I insist that those persons who knowingly and willfully become guilty of violating the law should not receive at our hands the favorable consideration accorded to those who have had respect unto and obeyed the laws of the land. These men were not compelled, at least legally speaking, to enter upon any such engagement. They were free citizens—free, moral, and commercial agents—and could engage or not as they saw proper. They concluded, knowing the law, to engage to perform this service. They entered into solemn contract, and said "we agree to this proposition, and will accept the compensation which you engage to pay us." The contracts were consummated by the performance of the labor, and the Government through its officers paid the agreed price, and here, it seems to me, the case should rest in so far as any further compensation is concerned. The accounts between the Government and its employés have been settled agreeably to contract and to the satisfaction of the parties, as judged by the spirit and terms in which they engaged to perform the services.

I insist now, as a matter of law and sound policy, that we ought not in these cases which I think involve largely the principle of class legislation, to open those questions which have been settled and to throw wide the doors of the Treasury to claims of the character contemplated by this bill, and which concern a class of men better able, in my judgment, to forego the proposed additional compensation than the thousands of our laboring people the country over, who, year by year, are submitting to wrongs far more grievous to be borne than the so-called loss of certain time by men who received the full agreed price for their labor.

There is another point upon which I wish to base an argument right here. Both of these parties have been guilty of a violation of the statute, and as all lawyers know who are familiar with the most ordinary principles of law it is manifestly against public policy to reward either party to a contract when that contract was itself a violation of the law. The violation of this statute was wrong, was bad faith, and contrary to good public policy. Gentlemen may say that as to the officers of the Government it certainly was contrary to good policy. But I insist that this claim applies equally to both contracting parties, and that each should be left where they have by their own voluntary acts placed themselves, and where the law says they should remain.

I am opposed to this bill upon many other grounds, one of which I would like to state before my time expires. I am opposed to opening this door to claims for back pay for the further reason that there are many thousands of soldiers throughout this broad land who, as the result of their service during the dark days of war, now bear upon their bodies not only the scars of battle but permanent injuries unfitting them for the active duties of life. Many of them come here to us and ask for special pensions, not being able to obtain them through the Pension Office. I am glad to attest the generosity of this Congress in meeting this class of cases fairly and in granting pensions to many hundreds of those who have thus applied for relief.

But let me remind this committee that with perhaps one or two exceptions we have denied to these men any thing like arrears of pensions. Yet here is a proposition to grant by special legislation to people who labored years ago, under contracts which have been consummated and settled, arrears of compensation for the labor they have performed. With all of my feeling of friendship for the laboring classes I do not regard this as a step which ought to be taken.

Let me say further that, as I understand it, this Congress declines positively in cases of injuries to persons employed in the civil service of the nation, and who may while so employed have been seriously injured by or through no fault of their own, but as a result of the negligence of co-laborers or those superintending the work in hand, to grant any compensation or pension to the party so injured. Now, I insist that while we refuse to the deserving soldiers of the land, who exposed their lives to the furies of war, arrears of pension, even when their disability at or since discharge is clearly established, and while we decline to compensate or pension worthy laborers who are injured in our civil service, it would be grossly unjust to single out this class of fortunate laborers and grant them "arrears of pay."

Mr. Chairman, I am most heartily in favor of the rigid enforcement of this law while it remains upon our statute-book, and I am not now in favor of its repeal; but, sir, I beg to urge that enforcement can be accomplished without the necessity of passing such a sweeping measure as this, which, in addition to many other objections, is unaccompanied by any estimate as to the amount of money required to meet its demands.

Some gentlemen seem to be of opinion that the most direct, speedy, and efficient way to accomplish enforcement is to compel payment at once of an immense amount of money, as if that proceeding would punish the Government and cause it to beware of the future, as might be the case were it a sensitive, economical capitalist; but, sir, this, in my judgment, is not the proper way to reach the desired object.

Heads of Departments and all officials of the Government are subject to the control of the people, as represented by the Congress, and if any official is persisting in violating this law, let us at once proceed by proper legislative action to call him to accountability and compel obedience by mandates within our power. The important consideration with reference to this matter, unless I am in error, is to secure for the future strict and faithful observance of this law, in deference not only to the law itself, but to that worthy sentiment in the country that is seeking the highest good and largest degree of prosperity to the laboring classes of the land.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would inquire, Mr. Chairman, how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. HERBERT. Did not the gentleman agree to give me three minutes of his time?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I did so, and I supposed I would have the time to yield. But previous to that I had agreed to give the gentleman from South Carolina ten minutes, and that is all the time I have remaining.

Mr. DIBBLE. As I understand the proposition now before the Committee of the Whole, it is to pay to all laborers who have been in Government employment since the passage of the eight-hour law such addition to the wages which they have received as will correspond to the difference of time between the hours they actually worked and eight hours a day. I presume that it will take one or two millions of dollars, perhaps more, of the Government money. But the question of amount is not material if it is a right which these laborers have under the law of the land.

Mr. TILLMAN. The friends of the bill admit that it will take $5,000,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. If it is not a matter of right, then we have no authority to give as a gratuity to a particular class of laboring men money out of the Treasury under the guise of advantage or benefit to laboring men. Whatever those benefits might be, they would reach but a small proportion of the laborers of the country and would constitute a burden upon all the rest of the laboring classes to pay it; for labor pays its full share of public burdens.

The question therefore comes down to this: Have these employés a legal right to this additional compensation? The eight-hour law was passed on the 25th of June, 1868, and provided "that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed or who may hereafter be employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States."

Is this law a matter of contract between each individual laborer and the Government, which enters into and becomes a part of every agreement for labor? On that point we have the express decision of the Supreme Court in the Martin case. It was there decided that it was not a contract between the parties; it was simply a direction of the Government to its agents, and that special contracts may be made in special cases. Judge Hunt says:

> This is a direction by Congress to the officers and agents of the Government of the United States establishing a principle to be observed in the labor of those engaged in its service. There are several things which the act does not regulate, which it may be worth while to notice:
> First. It does not establish the prices to be paid for its work.

That is the first point decided by the court.

> Second. The statute does not provide that the employer and the laborer may not agree with each other as to what shall constitute a day's work.

So that this law only established a general directory rule for the Departments of the Government. By the express decision of the Supreme Court, this law does not provide that laborers may not agree upon any other hours of labor. Such agreements have been made. Men have gone into the Government employment knowing how many hours they were to work and what they would get for that work; they have made such contracts, which are not affected by this law. They have received their pay. The matter has been settled. And, Mr. Chairman, in some kinds of severe work it is probable laborers can not endure eight hours' employment per day. I understand that in founderies and some other establishments men can not stand eight hours' work in a day. Suppose some of these workmen were employed only seven hours per day. Does the Government propose to adjust their accounts by taking off one-eighth of their wages?

Mr. Chairman, the construction of the law for which I am now contending, as given by the Supreme Court, has been the construction from the beginning. Attorney-General Evarts—I cite the twelfth volume of the Opinions of the Attorneys-General—was called upon early for his opinion as to the meaning of this law. On the 25th of November, 1868, he gave an opinion to the effect that the eight-hour law was simply directory; that it did not follow from the law that for eight hours' work the Government should pay the same price paid for ten hours' work in a private establishment; but that one principle ran through the laws of the United States on this subject—that there should be equality between the wages of employés of the Government and wages paid for similar industry in private establishments. His language is as follows:

> The equality between the wages of the employés of the Government and of similar industry in private employment (which is so manifestly just and expedient as to have been provided for by law in regard to employés of the Navy Department, and by departmental regulation in the War Department) is a matter of substance and not of form. This equality requires that the same worth of labor should be compensated in the public employment at the same rates of wages that it receives in private employment.

And, Mr. Chairman, the principle is correct. We, as representatives of the people, should not enact any law by which the Government shall pay more for what it gets than private individuals pay in the market for similar work. Such legislation would benefit only a favored class. It would not benefit the great body of the laborers of the country. They would be subjected to additional burdens, while the few laborers so fortunate as to be in Government employment would be put above the level of those who were their equals in skill, industry, and every other requisite for doing good service for their employers.

So also, Mr. Chairman, Attorney-General Hoar gave an opinion to the same effect in 1869. One of the arguments used in favor of the eight-hour law, as shown by the debates at the time of its passage, was that by continuous employment of workmen for eight hours a day the same amount of work could be accomplished in the long run as by the employment of workmen for a longer daily period. Be that as it may, we know that the advocates of this law hold eight hours to be the period which day in and day out on the average will produce the most effective results in the ordinary kinds of labor with due regard to the health and strength of workmen. On that principle the eight-hour law was based.

If it should be, Mr. Evarts says, in his opinion from which I have quoted, that eight hours of work day in and day out will not accomplish for the Government as much as is accomplished in private establishments by ten hours' work day after day, then, he says, according to the principle of equality the price of labor for eight hours should be correspondingly reduced. If, on the contrary, labor continued day after day for eight hours will produce equal results with the ten-hour system in other establishments, then the same amount of compensation should be paid. But the rate of compensation was not fixed by law; that was left to be dependent entirely upon experience in various branches of industry and subject to agreement in every instance.

I cite these views of the highest legal advisers of the Government, expressed for the purpose of guiding the Departments in relation to the eight-hour law, shortly after its passage, simply to show that the rule was established that all Government employés should receive compensation equal to that paid in private employment for like services.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOPKINS. In order to avoid the formality of having the committee rise, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now considered as terminated.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that general debate be now closed on this bill. That is substantially the agreement arrived at some time ago. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill.

The first section was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whoever, as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, has been employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States since the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work, shall be paid for each eight hours he has been employed as for a full day's work, at the price per day as regulated by private parties in the vicinity in which the work was performed, without reference to the number of hours' work required by such parties.

Mr. HOPKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "been," in line 3 of section 1, insert "since June 25, 1868, or who may hereafter be."

After the word "States," in line 5, strike out down to the word "shall," in line 7; so that, if thus amended, the section will read:

"That whoever, as a laborer, workman, or mechanic, has been, since June 25, 1868, or who may heraftер be, employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, shall be paid for each eight hours he has been employed as for a full day's work, at the price per day as regulated by private parties in the vicinity in which the work was performed, without reference to the number of hours' work required by such parties."

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest whether it would not be quite as well to strike out in line 8, from the word "at" to the close, and insert in lieu thereof "should be paid the price of ten hours' work for eight hours' labor." [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman can offer that amendment if he desires to.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I move that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire a vote and do not wish to detain the committee by a speech.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In line 8, after the words "per day," I move to insert "of the same length;" so it will read:

At the price per day of the same length as regulated by private parties in the vicinity in which the work was performed, without reference to the number of hours' work required by such parties.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to be heard on my amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Allow me to suggest, Mr. Chairman, the amendments can not be considered as germane amendments to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York to speak to his amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. My understanding is that the chairman of the committee and the committee itself which reported this bill understand there is no legal liability on the part of the Government to pay these alleged claims. There is no use of introducing or citing authorities, for if they believed these were legal claims against the Government the Treasury Department would have been invited to audit and send them to Congress to make appropriation for their payment.

Again, sir, if they had supposed there was a legal liability on the part of the Government there would have been no necessity to put in the pending measure in the peculiar shape in which we find it a rule of law to control the decision. Take the second section; it provides that the Court of Claims shall pass on these demands as though eight hours constituted a day's work. If there was such a rule of law now to control the Court of Claims this provision would be unnecessary.

The bill assumes these claimants have no valid claim against the Government, and proposes to give them this gratuity. It assumes they have already been paid in full; but in addition it will, by favor, give them for eight hours' work the price of ten. Why not then have this fairly and openly stated upon the face of the bill itself? If in the future that is exactly what is intended to be accomplished, why not let the bill so express it? Why not let it clearly say to all those in the Government employ the Government will pay them for eight hours' service the value or price of ten? Then you will have something definite and positive for your labor. Then you can afford to make these demagogical speeches. You can afford to say that you propose to elevate labor in the Government employ by paying it 25 per cent. or upward more than it is worth and more than labor elsewhere receives. You will have paid for the privilege.

Then you may wave the flag and talk about the laboring man, how your heart thrills with interest for those who labor, and all that sort of thing. You will then have passed a bill which expresses precisely on its face what you profess to desire to accomplish.

Now, sir, I am ready to meet such a question as is here presented, squarely and decidedly. We all talk to our constituents. I talk to mine. They are mainly laboring men. They want a fair day's wages for a fair day's work, and I am in favor of their receiving it, and they know it. They are my peers and, as to this great labor question, are, many of them, my superiors in knowledge. They believe that the profits of business should be fairly divided between capital and labor, so that each may receive its fair proportion, and so do I. They do not believe in, and they have a most profound contempt for, this buncombe talk of which we have heard so much this session.

I should like to be permitted to go further, and if my five minutes is about to run out I hope some gentleman will be able to obtain the floor and yield to me so I may be able to finish.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will be glad to yield the gentleman my time.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentlemen who favored this bill understand perfectly well that if you pass it it is a mere declaration without further force or effect. It will not pay these claims, but by another law you will have to appropriate the necessary amount of money. Without that appropriation this bill amounts to nothing. It must be considered then as put in here as a cheat and a fraud for the purpose of advertising that you will give people laboring in the Government employ 25 per cent. more than labor is paid elsewhere. But you make no appropriation to pay the amount you have promised. You talk about your friendship for this class of people and of your intention to favor them, and you know nevertheless your bill is defective in that you can not pay one dollar under it. Even when these claims have passed they can not be paid until the appropriation for that purpose has undergone the scrutiny of the Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, who presides over the Committee on Appropriations of this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOPKINS rose.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been recognized.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, part of the speech just made by the gentleman from New York was made in the Senate by a Senator from Ohio when this bill was pending before that body, and the same proposition the gentleman now makes was made in the Senate to amend the title.

In regard to the allusion the gentleman saw proper to make as to demagogy in connection with the presentation of this bill, I can only refer the gentleman to the platform of his own party——

Mr. HISCOCK. Now I am not going to wander off into a political discussion upon this bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then do not reflect upon the views and opinions of those who see proper to support the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not talking of this bill at all for party effect.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a question of order. Who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WELLER. Then I hope his time will not be filched away from him.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Illinois rose to offer an amendment with the understanding that he would yield me his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania before the gentleman from Illinois claimed the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not propose or desire to have a political discussion upon this bill; but, as I have said, when the gentleman from New York insinuates that there is some attempt at demagogy in this matter, I repeat I refer him to the latest platform of his own party which declares in support of this proposition.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, if the gentleman is going into that question I insist upon having time to reply.

Mr. HOPKINS. If his charge of demagogy is true as to the advocates of this measure it is a charge that lies against the assembled wisdom of his own party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order; no further amendment is in order.

Mr. CANNON. There has been no substitute, as I understand it, which is permitted under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose a substitute would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman has a substitute to offer, it can be offered now.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is not in order at this point. It relates to another part of the section, having no connection with the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order would be good if the gentleman had made it in time.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to state that I made it some time ago; before the debate commenced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman's pardon. The Chair had not observed that the point of order was made.

Mr. KEIFER. I think if we are to go on in an orderly way we had better not skip over from place to place in the bill in offering these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Ohio did make the point of order in time. The amendment is not in order as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I move now to strike out the last word, and yield the time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, something has been said as to the Republican platform. I have not the Republican platform before me but I do not believe it proposes that we by legislative enactment shall attempt to change the value of gold. I do not believe it advocates legislation which would fix the wages of labor. I do not believe it favors legislation to fix the value of any property or commodity whatever. I do not believe it declares the laboring man shall not make his contract with the Government or with any other party as to the compensation he shall receive for his services. If it does, sir, I am compelled to say that upon that question I am an independent. [Laughter and applause.]

We all know the price of labor like everything else depends on the demand, and the most we can do, and I am in favor of that, is to create as large a demand as is practicable.

One other suggestion that I have to make will test the question whether this bill is presented here honestly and in good faith. Let those gentlemen who have charge of it tell us how much money will be required to discharge the liabilities they propose to create. How much money is involved? Then when you have told us that put into the bill an appropriation for the amount. It has been suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that it will require $30,000,000. I have shown you that you can not pay a dollar under the bill until the Committee on Appropriations has passed upon the audit or adjudications and reported to the House; that another bill must be passed.

Having pointed that out to you, if this is in the interest of any one but claim agents, and if it is above all things in the interest of the laboring men, and they are to receive this money, and not of men that expect by some future legislation to get an appropriation bill through to cover it; if it is not in the interest, I repeat, of these claim agents, then put into the bill the amount of money necessary to pay the liabilities you propose to create and provide the money shall be paid directly to the claimants. That tests the question whether the bill comes here in good faith for the purpose of giving the people who labor for the Government this gratuity, or whether it is here as a text for demagogues to eternally harp on as to how their hearts plead for the laboring men, or for claim agents.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has more than once called attention to the fact that there is no appropriation in this bill. The gentleman very well knows that every claim which is referred to the Court of Claims has to be appropriated for after it is adjudicated.

I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate on this section.

Mr. DUNN. I hope that will not be done. I have an amendment I wish to offer.

Mr. HOPKINS. I merely propose to limit debate on the first section.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6541) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of this bill; and pending that I move that all debate on the first section and amendments thereto be limited to one-half minute.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman mean to include all future amendments?

Mr. HOPKINS. All amendments to this section.

Mr. REED. There are some further amendments to be proposed. I suggest the gentleman only limit debate on the pending amendments.

Mr. HOPKINS. I shall not object to amendments being offered, but I think we have had sufficient discussion on this section.

Mr. REED. It is very desirable an opportunity should be given for explanation. For instance, I should like to suggest that the words after the word "work," in line 8 of section 1, should be stricken out, and I would like to explain what seems to me the difficulty if those words are left in.

Mr. HOPKINS. That amendment has, I think, already been offered.

Mr. REED. I think not.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate insisted on its amendment to the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL as conferees on the part of the Senate.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and pending that motion he moves that all debate upon the section under consideration and amendments thereto be limited to one-half minute.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope that will not be insisted on. As I understood the gentleman, when he proposed to limit general debate he gave as a reason that there would be ample time for discussion under the five-minute rule. Now we have had only ten minutes debate and he proposes to cut it off.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman forgets that I afterward yielded an additional three-quarters of an hour for general debate.

On the motion to limit debate there were—ayes 70, noes 35.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only twelve members voting therefor—not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make the point as to a quorum after he has demanded tellers.

So the motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Labor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 20.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the first section of the bill and amendments thereto has been limited to one-half minute. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "work," in line 8 of section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the words proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the price per day as regulated by private parties in the vicinity in which the work was performed, without reference to the number of hours' work required by such parties.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the half-minute allowed for debate has not been occupied. I wish to say if these words are stricken out it will leave the person to recover, if he recovers at all, at the same rate as he performs the work for eight hours; and it will not leave the inquiry to be made as to the rate of wages paid in the vicinity.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 55, noes 27.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I offer as a substitute for the section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whoever as a laborer, workman, or mechanic is hereafter employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States shall be paid for each eight hours he shall be employed as for a full day's work.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is right.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is this a substitute for the entire bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a substitute proposed for section 1 of the bill.

The question being taken, the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further amendments to the first section the Clerk will read the next section.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to call up the message received a few moments ago from the Senate in reference to the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the message.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 28, 1884.

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill of the House, No. 7069, making appropriations for the legislative, judicial, and executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asks a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COCKRELL be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as managers of the conference on the part of the House the gentleman from Texas, Mr. HANCOCK, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before that is done I desire to ask whether it would be in order to have the Senate amendments read.

The SPEAKER. It would not at this stage.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I understand that the House is asked to insist on its disagreement to something we do not know about.

The SPEAKER. This is in response to the request on the part of the Senate for a conference.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I notice that there was considerable debate in the Senate on some portions of the House bill. If we are to insist on our disagreement to the Senate amendments I would like to have them read, so as to understand what is before the conference committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that that request is too late.

The SPEAKER. The House disagreed to the amendments early in to-day's session; that was the time to discuss the Senate amendments.

ELECTORAL COUNT.

Mr. EATON. I desire to have taken from the Speaker's table at this time the message of the Senate announcing its disagreement to the amendments of the House to Senate bill 25 to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decisions of questions arising thereon, and asking a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon. I move that the House insist upon these amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. EATON, Mr. BENNETT, and Mr. HART.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The committee resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6541) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read section 2 of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the substitute for section 1 was adopted.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to reconsider is not in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then I give notice that when reported to the House that amendment will be objected to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read section 2 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all claims for labor so performed in excess of eight hours per day are hereby referred to the Court of Claims, to be adjudicated upon the basis that eight hours constitute a day's work, and are to be paid for at the price per day as provided for in the first section of this act, and judgment given against the United States in favor of each claimant for the amount found due, to be paid as other judgments of the Court of Claims against the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to amend section 2 by inserting, in line 2, after the word "day," the words "and which have not been or may not be settled upon that basis."

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] if his amendment just offered is not in view of the action which was taken by the Committee of the Whole in striking out the first section as amended, and adopting the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT]?

Mr. HOPKINS. I answer the gentleman very decidedly, "no," because at the opening of this discussion, before I had any idea that the amendment to which the gentlemen refers would be adopted, I gave notice of this amendment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I remember the gentleman's suggestion now. I think his amendment should be amended, in view of what has been done by the Committee of the Whole, by striking out the words "have not been or;" so that it will read, if adopted—

That all claims for labor so performed in excess of eight hours per day, which may not be settled upon that basis, are hereby referred to the Court of Claims, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That is debatable, I believe?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is entitled to the floor on his amendment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not know that I desire to be heard upon it now.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is recognized to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope that order will be restored so that I can be heard.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I want the attention of the committee for one moment on my amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I insist that I have been recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to five minutes upon his amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But he did not take the floor, and the Chair recognized "the gentleman from Kentucky."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not take any advantage of the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Neither will "the gentleman from Kentucky." [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. In the five minutes to which I am entitled under the rule I desire to give something of the history of the legislation which is under consideration to-day. In the Forty-sixth Congress, more than five years ago, a bill was introduced pretending to have in view the enforcement of the eight-hour law. I then moved this amendment:

That this act shall apply to future contracts and future labor only, and shall not be held as authority to control past contracts or labor.

That was objected to by the committee reporting the bill, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] moved to lay the whole subject on the table, which was agreed to. I stated to the House then that that legislation was intended as a "sapper and miner" to take millions of dollars out of the Treasury, and to-day we have a verification of that prediction. Among those who voted to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote tabling the whole subject I find these—and I will read the names only of a portion of those who are now in Congress:

Aiken, Aldrich [now in the Senate], Anderson, Bayne, Blount, Browne of Indiana, Cabell, Cannon, Chalmers, Conger [now in the Senate], Culberson of Texas, Davidson, Davis of Illinois, Deuster, Dibrell, Ellis, Forney, Garfield, Hammond, Hiscock, King, McCoid, McKinley, McMillin, Reagan, Reed, Turner of Kentucky, Evins, Warner of Ohio, Washburn, Wellborn, Williams, and others.

Mr. WILLIS. Is the gentleman reading out a funeral notice?

Mr. MCMILLIN. If it is a funeral notice I do not care. I do not care whether it is a funeral or a resurrection notice. All I seek is to do justice, and the bill reported from the committee does not do that. So far from being a funeral notice of those who voted to lay the subject on the table, I will say that an ex-President of the United States, now deceased, in less than fifteen months after that time was nominated and in less than eighteen months was elected President. I refer to President Garfield.

The people of this country can not be deceived, nor do I believe the Committee on Labor desire to deceive. The masses of the laborers of this country will know that there can be no benefit to the laboring man in going back and over-riding the contracts made by those who sixteen years ago worked for the Government in order to pay them in excess of what was proposed by those contracts. Let us enforce the eight-hour law as long as it is on the statutes, and while it promises any good. I have no objection to that. But when the courts have decided that those who labored for the Government in the past under contract are not entitled to the compensation that the first section of this bill as reported sought to give them, I do not think we should reopen them by legislation, especially in view of the uncontradicted statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that it will cost the Government from twenty to thirty millions of dollars. Let us give them every cent they are entitled to under the law. Let us open the courts to them in the fullest manner, but I protest against entirely new retroactive legislation increasing the wages of any class of employés.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me remarkable that we should be considering here to-day a proposition to reopen old accounts upon which laborers have received all that they contracted for, accounts which have been settled, and which, if reopened, will, according to the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], involve an amount somewhere between twenty and thirty million dollars, nine dollars of which out of every ten will in all probability go to claim agents in the city of Washington. When we have here a Calendar having upon it undisposed of a thousand bills, reported from your committees, proposing to pay just claims, it does seem to me the merest subterfuge to propose seriously to pass a law not appropriating a dollar to pay any one of these laborers, but an empty law, which in the future will call for an appropriation out of the Treasury, which may or may not be made. I said there were a thousand bills upon the Calendar. No, sir, there are nine hundred and seventy-seven by actual count, reported from your committees, bills for the payment of the just dues of claimants who have been knocking at the doors of Congress in some instances for more than twenty years, claims of $100, $500, $5,000, or $15,000 as the case may happen to be. The majority of these claimants are poor people who can not come here to urge their claims. The bills to pay these poor people are to be pushed aside, and the valuable time of this House, as the session is drawing to a close in the hot days of June, is to be squandered on such a bill as this.

The people will not be deceived by this bill. They have not forgotten the injunction passed on man, "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." It rests with the laborer himself, it rests upon his ability as a man, his ability of arm or head (whether he be a laborer of high or low degree), how he shall labor and how long he shall labor. And now a committee proposes to pass through this House a measure which practically says to the laborer, "Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Gentlemen in this House propose to say to the laborers of this country that this is a great paternal Government, and that we propose to establish a law whereby they may get their bread without working for it. No more dangerous doctrine was ever advocated in this country. It originated in demagogy, it is preached by fanatics, and it is not believed in by the honest laborers of this country.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MCMILLIN to the amendment of Mr. HOPKINS, it was agreed to—ayes 107, noes 19.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6541) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending section of House bill 6541 and amendments thereto be terminated in one-half minute.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to amend so as to allow ten minutes for further debate.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CRISP, there were—ayes 105, noes 37.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, and Mr. FIEDLER called for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 16, noes 143; less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays. I want gentlemen to go on record on this question.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, before the result is announced I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in print.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. On the motion that the House adjourn tellers have been refused, and the yeas and nays are refused. On agreeing to the motion there are—ayes 105, noes 37. The motion is agreed to; and the House stands adjourned until Monday morning next at 11 o'clock.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAYNE: Resolution of Grand Army of the Republic Post No. 128, Allegheny County, Pa., protesting against the passage of the bill granting pensions to all soldiers of the late war who served sixty days, and favoring an increase of the pensions of widows and orphans and of disabled soldiers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLACKBURN: Petition of citizens of Oldham County, Kentucky, relative to the claim of said county—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DIBRELL: Papers relating to the claim of Asa Faulkner, Lewis Faulkner, and S. B. Sparlock—to the same committee.

By Mr. WOODWARD: Petition of S. Chadwick and others, of Crawford County, Wisconsin, in relation to homesteads and the disposition of public lands, and other subjects—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of Mrs. Sallie Bennett, of Floral City, Fla., a citizen of Hernando County, Florida. The petitioner states that she settled on a piece of land belonging to the Government of the United States, in the State of Florida, in the county of Hernando, and has continued to reside there. She also states that she built a dwelling-house, set out an orange grove, and made other valuable improvements. She also states that about the 1st of May, 1883, she filed her declaratory statement on said land, accompanied with proof of her actual settlement; also paid the proper fees, and filed the same with the register and receiver of the local land office at Gainesville, Fla., in order to require a pre-emption right to said land. The register and receiver rejected the application on the ground that this land was held for a certain railroad company, or that the records in the office showed said land to be railroad-indemnity land. The petitioner attempted to appeal to the General Land Office for redress, but the register and receiver, as the accompanying letter which is attached to this petition will show, refused an appeal. She also says that the Florida Railroad and Navigation Company offered this land for sale at $5 and $6 per acre. She states that she appeared by attorney at the railroad land office, at Wildwood, and having no other recourse, and not wishing to lose her improvements, and not being informed concerning the rights of the railroad to sell the land, she did then and there pay to the company one-half of the purchase money and executed her promissory note for the balance. The petitioner prays that this honorable body will consider this matter in her behalf and grant her such relief as may be in the power of Congress. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. I present a memorial of citizens of Little Rock, Ark., remonstrating against the enactment of any measure relating to the telegraph which shall increase the number of public officials, or establish a governmental monopoly of the telegraph business, or which shall employ the functions of government to destroy the property of individuals who have embarked in legitimate enterprise to provide ample facilities for the public accommodation. I also present similar memorials from citizens of Hot Springs, Eureka Springs, Pine Bluff, and Fort Smith, all in the State of Arkansas. I move that the memorials lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a memorial similar to those just presented by the Senator from Arkansas signed by numerous citizens of the town of Columbia, in the State of Tennessee. I move that it lie on the table, the bill having been reported.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SLATER. On the 26th of June I submitted by instruction of the Committee on Public Lands a report to accompany the bill (S. 2036) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed and recommitted to the committee. I now submit the report again by order of the committee, and ask that the usual number be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed under the rule.

Mr. SLATER. I desire also to say that the report is not a unanimous report. Some of the members of the committee will desire to file a minority report at some future day. I ask that permission be granted for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks leave that the views of the minority may be submitted hereafter. If there be no objection, leave will be granted.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1291) to quiet and confirm the title to certain lands in the Saginaw Bay, in the State of Michigan, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3520) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORGAN. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1368) donating three hundred and twenty acres of public land to each of the survivors of the Mountain Meadow massacre, and to each of the legal heirs of any one killed in such massacre, to report it adversely, and to make the statement in regard to the claim in favor of the survivors of the Mountain Meadow massacre in Utah that if there is any valid claim against the Government the Committee on Public Lands think it is an appropriation not within their jurisdiction; it should be a claim compensated in money and not in public lands.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar. Since the bill was introduced, in fact since the matter went to the committee, I obtained possession of facts that I do not believe I placed in the hands of the committee. I am satisfied that those parties are entitled to something from the Government. I am not prepared to say now whether it should be land or money, but I wish to make a more definite and certain showing than has been made for one or the other after a while. All I ask now is that the bill may go on the Calendar, so that I may take such action afterward upon it as I may consider proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2264) to provide for the sale of the lands belonging to the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians, in Kansas, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2084) to amend chapter 464 of the acts of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, entitled "An act to provide for a public building at the city of Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana," reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1838) for the erection of a public building at Akron, Ohio, reported it without amendment.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (S. 2352) to continue the public printing; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Congressional Printer to continue the work required by law in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made, for seven days.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Secretary to read a letter from the Public Printer, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D.C., June 30, 1883.

SIR: The appropriation for this office is not available after to-day. Unless Congress passes a joint resolution extending the appropriation until the sundry civil bill becomes a law it will be necessary for me to discontinue all work after to-day, including the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Will you please see that the necessary resolution is passed to-day?

Very respectfully,

S. P. ROUNDS, Public Printer.

Hon. W. B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2353) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to aid in the construction of the Florida Railroad by "an act granting public lands in alternate sections to the States of Florida and Alabama to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States," and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FAIR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2354) to modify existing laws relating to regulation of commerce and navigation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 2355) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant a right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2356) for the relief of Mary F. Potts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

THE SENATE MANUAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are in order, and the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on a previous occasion, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. FRYE June 27, 1884, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, under the direction of the Committee on Rules, a new edition of the Senate Manual in accordance with the suggestions made in their report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair notices that the Senator from Maine is not in his seat, but felt it to be his duty to lay the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. Let it go over informally, as the Senator who introduced it is not here and it is a matter of some little importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be laid aside and presented as under the rule of objected resolutions to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be laid before the Senate to-morrow.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the Senate take up the resolution which I offered on Thursday last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 849, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Finance Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to take up the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I trust——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MORRILL. I trust that will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I hope it will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to take up the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask what the bill is?

Mr. MITCHELL. I was about to suggest that the bill itself be read. I ask that the bill be read as it passed the House.

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know under what rule of the Senate the resolution is being considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is under the eighth rule of the Senate which provides that at this time the Senate shall proceed to the Calendar unless the Senate otherwise order. The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes that the Senate shall otherwise order by proceeding to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill is not on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Order of Business 849, resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania, is on the Calendar, which is a resolution to discharge the Committee on Finance from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. HOAR. I see that the bill is very short. May it be read for information?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That until January 1, 1886, United States trade-dollars shall be received at their face value in payment of all dues to the United States, and shall not be again paid out or in any other manner issued.

SEC. 2. That the holders of any United States trade-dollars, on presentation of the same at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, may receive in exchange therefor a like amount and value, dollar for dollar, in standard silver dollars of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the trade-dollars received by, paid to, or deposited with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer or national depository of the United States shall not be paid out or in any other manner issued, but, at the expense of the United States, shall be transmitted to the coinage mints and recoined into standard silver dollars.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws authorizing the coinage and issuance of United States trade-dollars are hereby repealed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order for me to state very briefly the object of the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order on a motion to take up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I simply wanted to state my reasons for offering the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate take up for consideration the resolution offered by him on a previous day to discharge the Committee on Finance from the consideration of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. If I were not paired I should vote "yea." My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired on all questions with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired on this and other public questions with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] was called home a few days since and is necessarily absent. As announced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], my colleague is paired with him upon all questions. I make the announcement for the day.

REMARKS ON RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to state for the information of the Senate that I wish to make some general remarks upon the river and harbor bill, and I shall probably take the occasion when the bill is ready to be reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, unless the gentlemen in charge of the bill prefer some other time.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF OMAHA.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to take up the bill (S. 2348) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad to get the Senate this morning, if convenient, to act on the resolution I offered some time ago. I ask that the resolution be taken up now for consideration.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust the Senator will not interfere with the passage of the bill. It is a mere formal matter and will take but a moment.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2348) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW YORK BANKS.

Mr. BUTLER. At the request of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] I ask that a table which I have had prepared, a tabulation of the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, be printed in the RECORD, in order that he may have access to it to-morrow; and to-morrow, after the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to vote upon the resolution. I therefore withdraw my motion to take up the resolution now, and will ask to have the table printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the table, the nature of which he has described, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it an official document?

Mr. BUTLER. An official document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The following tabulation is an exact transcript, in headings and amounts, of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, made to Congress, and purporting to show the condition of the forty-eight national banks of New York city in 1883:

The entire liabilities of the national banks in 1883, as shown by the foregoing table, were $457,217,563.19. Of this amount, $356,266,539.53 was payable on demand, to wit:

Dividends unpaid	$223,163 12
Individual deposits	191,626,940 90
Certified checks	30,045,361 48
United States deposits	420,095 01
Deposits of United States disbursing officers	225,399 72
Due to other national banks	96,558,148 04
Due to State banks and bankers	37,167,431 26
Total	356,266,539 52

To meet this liability the banks held in lawful money, stocks, bonds, and mortgages, $177,348,746.38, composed of these items:

Specie	$50,274,173 82
Legal-tender notes	17,117,605 00
Bills of other banks	1,812,886 00
Fractional currency	45,399 32

United States certificates of deposit	2,620,000 00
Exchanges for clearing-house	69,207,772 07
Total	177,348,746 38

Subtracting the total available assets from the demand liabilities, the latter exceeded the former by $178,917,793.15.

The specie and legal-tenders held by the banks aggregated $69,250,064.14. The amount of reserve required by law was $89,066,634.88. It follows, therefore, that the banks were short in "lawful money" in the sum of $19,816,570.74. In other words, the average percentage of reserve of all the banks referred to was 19.4 instead of 25.

The methods of the Comptroller's Office are illustrated by the statement of "The National Bank of the Republic," as follows:

With liabilities amounting to $8,307,018.08, this bank owned only $200,000 of United States bonds, pledged for a circulation of $180,000. Of "other stocks, bonds, and mortgages" it held $106,000, which, strangely enough, is the exact amount claimed in 1882, though in the mean time securities of this class had greatly depreciated in value.

The amount of liabilities payable on demand was $5,762,114.89, and its "lawful money" on hand, $534,941.99. Crediting the bank with its "exchanges for clearing-house," $1,650,497.36, and the amount "due from other banks and bankers," $564,160.24—in all, $2,214,657.60—the surplus available assets of the association still fell short of its demand obligations to the extent of $3,012,515.30, to be realized from the following:

Loans and discounts	$4,346,050 57

MARGARET CASSIDY.

Mr. PLATT. Some time since there was passed in the Senate a bill for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy. A House bill came to the Senate Saturday, which had been passed by the House, being exactly in the same language with the bill passed by the Senate. It now lies on the table of the Senate, and I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill, so that it may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Margaret Cassidy, widow of Peter A. Cassidy, deceased, $2,500 in full compensation for the past, present, and future use of the patent for his invention of machine for cutting vellum cloth.

Mr. INGALLS. What committee reported the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I object to it.

Mr. PLATT. I trust the Senator from Kansas will not object. Did the Senator hear the statement which I made about it?

Mr. INGALLS. I did not.

Mr. PLATT. A bill identical in terms with this bill was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Patents.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. PLATT. That bill was discussed here and passed. This bill has been passed by the House. I ask that action may be had on this bill, so that it may become a law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know whether it is necessary to recall the bill from the House which the Senate has already passed. If it be necessary I will submit a motion to that effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not necessary unless there is danger of the House passing the bill.

Mr. PLATT. If it is unnecessary I shall not make the motion.

ALONZO GESNER.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1299) for the relief of Alonzo Gesner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has any bill of that kind been passed by the Senate?

Mr. SLATER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have an explanation. I do not propose that we shall take up House bills and pass them without consideration in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to take up is not debatable unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a House bill, and if we can not understand what the bill is, I object to its second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read the second time and laid on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I move to refer it to the appropriate committee, if we can not have an explanation of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not yet before the Senate. The Senator from Oregon moves to take it from the table for consideration.

Mr. SLATER. I hope the Senator will wait for an explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to approve for payment, if, on examination, he finds the surveys were made in accordance with the report and approval of the surveyor-general of the State of Oregon of date December 1, 1877, certain surveys of the public lands made by Deputy Surveyor Alonzo Gesner, amounting to fifty-four miles and three and nine hundredths chains of township-lines, and three hundred miles and sixty-one and ninety-two hundreths chains of section-lines, at the rate of $7 per mile for township and $6 per mile for section lines, amounting in all to $2,182.91.

Mr. SLATER. This bill in exact terms, except the clause making the appropriations, was reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, and on February 18, 1884, passed the Senate. The House bill is precisely the same as the Senate bill, except the wording of the appropriating clause. The bill is a very just one; has been carefully examined by both committees; has twice passed the Senate, and has been several times reported to the Senate from the Interior Department. I hope the bill will pass as it came from the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. JAMES N. BURNES of Missouri, and Mr. WILLIAM H. CALKINS of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PLUMB. I move the appointment of a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the present state of the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. The bill was passed by the Senate a few days since with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is the bill before us now?

Mr. HARRIS. Is it a House bill?

Mr. PLUMB. A House bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is the bill upon our tables so that we can act on it?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know whether the bill is here or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would not be in order unless the bill were here. If the bill was here the motion would be in order. If the bill is in the House the request for a conference must come from the House.

Mr. HARRIS. If the bill referred to by the Senator from Kansas is in the custody of the House of Representatives, of course his motion would not be in order now.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator know whether the bill is here or not?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers are not in the possession of the Senate. The Chair thinks that, if not objected to, a resolution asking a conference with the House of Representatives upon any subject which relates to the business of the two Houses would be in order. Does the Senator from Kansas offer a resolution of that character?

Mr. PLUMB. I move that a committee of conference be appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill which I now report, and that the Chair appoint the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Can that be done in the absence of the bill? Can a committee of conference be appointed unless the bill is here?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is under the impression that it would be in order to offer a resolution and pass it which should ask a conference with the House of Representatives although the papers respecting which the conference is asked may not be in the possession of the Senate. It would be in the form of a resolution which of course is liable under objection to go over for one day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection in this particular case, for I know nothing about it; but I think it would be a very dangerous precedent; and therefore, in order to allow the Chair to look into it further, I will object to it to-day and let it go over.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move that the House be requested to return to the custody of the Senate House bill 4680.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he knows whether the House has taken any action whatever.

Mr. PLUMB. The House has not taken any action, and the motion is for the purpose of getting the bill out from the mass of bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will submit the motion.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the House be requested to return the bill the title of which has just been read to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. May I inquire if the deficiency appropriation bill has been sent in from the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is on the table.

Mr. HALE. Has a conference committee been appointed by the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has not yet been laid before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I ask that it be laid before the Senate. I was not here when the message came in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that there be laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on House bill No. 7235. The action of the House will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 30, 1884.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. RANDALL, Mr. BURNES, and Mr. CALKINS be the managers at the said conference on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the request of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

INTERNAL-REVENUE PROSECUTIONS.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 611, being House bill 6370, reported from the Judiciary Committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4 of section 1, before the word "arising," to strike out "crime" and insert "of the various offenses;" so as to read:

That no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any of the various offenses arising under the internal-revenue laws of the United States unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within two years next after the commission of the offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. From what committee does the bill come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, as appears from the Calendar.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 8 of section 1, after the word "is," to strike out "beyond the reach of legal process" and insert "absent from the district wherein the same is committed;" so as to read:

Provided, That the time during which the person committing the offense is absent from the district wherein the same is committed shall not be taken as any part of the time limited by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Two years is a very short period of limitation for these offenses. Some of them are very grave. A fraud against the revenue involving many thousands of dollars may be going on for three or four years. A lapse of two years is a very brief limitation. I have always been in favor of some limitation upon criminal proceedings against citizens, but two years is very short. I move that the time be extended to four years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A committee amendment is now pending.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear from the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] whether he has any objection to my suggestion?

Mr. GARLAND. The bill came from the House and was agreed to by the Committee on the Judiciary with some verbal changes. I will have read by the Secretary the report made by the House committee, which I think will meet with the Senator's acceptance. It seems that this bill is in conformity with the recommendation both of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Their letters are in the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. MCMILLIN in the House of Representatives April 11, 1884:

The Committee on Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws, having considered the same, give the following reasons for its passage, as recommended by the committee:

The limitation now fixed by law for prosecutions for a large number of offenses against the internal-revenue laws is five years. This your committee thinks is too long a period, as it results in stale and vexatious prosecutions which end and could end in nothing but the harassing of the citizen and the accumulation of large cost-bills, which the Government in most cases has to pay. But your committee thought it prudent to submit the bill to the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion. He, in turn, called on the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the following are the letters of both approving the bill, with some slight modifications, which your committee have adopted:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1884.

SIR: Your letter of the 4th instant is received, in which you submit for my opinion thereon bill H. R. 6370, being "A bill to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws.

I have the honor to inclose herewith a report on the bill of the views of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which I concur. A limitation of two years after these offenses are committed was suggested to Congress in my annual report of the finances for 1883, on page 44 thereof.

A proviso excepting cases in which the accused party places himself beyond the jurisdiction of the proper court should be inserted in the bill, so that nothing be left to construction that may be so easily provided for.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM C. OATES,
Chairman Committee on Revision of the Laws,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 5, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference to me, for report of my views thereon, of bill H. R. No. 6370, "to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violating internal-revenue laws," and to reply that my views remain as set forth in my annual report to you for the year ended June 30, 1883. They are as follows:

"I respectfully suggest that Congress be requested to enact a statute fixing the limitation for the prosecution of offenses against the revenue laws at a much less period than five years, as now provided by law, except in cases where the accused places himself beyond the jurisdiction of the court of the district where the offense was committed. I am informed by judges of the United States district courts that in nearly every instance where a conviction has been secured the offense was committed within two years before the indictment was found. Cases older than two years are almost invariably lost by the Government. It is also very difficult in such cases to prevent abuses whereby the costs of prosecution are increased, and ultimately the ends of justice defeated. I am of the opinion that a shorter period of limitation would be much better in many ways and greatly lessen the expense of such prosecutions to the Government."

As to the exact period of limitation—whether as contemplated in this bill, one year in most internal-revenue cases, or a somewhat longer period—that may well be left to the wisdom of Congress; but I am firmly convinced that a modification of the laws on that subject as they now exist would be beneficial to the interests of the revenue.

The papers referred to me are herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

WALTER EVANS, Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

It will thus be seen that, according to the testimony of these high officials who are at the head of this system of internal revenue, almost every prosecution begun after a lapse of more than two years ends in vexatious failure. All the information your committee have been able to get on the subject corroborates this. They therefore recommend the amendment of the bill by striking out the words "one year," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two years;" and by striking out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, and inserting in lieu the following words:

"Provided, The time during which the person committing the offense is beyond the reach of legal process shall not be taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of such action."

And when so amended they recommend the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the second amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be in order after the committee's amendments are through.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 11 of section 1, after the word "such," to strike out "action" and insert "proceedings;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided, That the time during which the person committing the offense is absent from the district wherein the same is committed shall not be taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of such proceedings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 13 of section 1, after the words "apply to," to strike out "pending cases" and insert "offenses committed prior to its passage;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to offenses committed prior to its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio now moves to amend the bill in line 6 of section 1 by striking out the word "two" and inserting the word "four."

Mr. SHERMAN. I am quite sure that two years is too short. Take the famous whisky frauds, the greatest that ever occurred in this country, when the Government was cheated out of many millions of dollars. They were not developed in two years. So with the frauds in 1867, where we failed to collect the whisky tax, and the price of whisky was one-half the amount of the tax for two or three years, and yet the actual frauds were not discovered for two years.

For the great body of the offenses I have no objection to a limitation of two years, the smaller offenses, such as making false returns by special distillers, &c. The great offenses ought not to be limited to so short a period as two years. Take the star-route cases, where the period of limitation was three years. That operated as a bar to prevent the prosecution of great offenses.

I hope the Senate will at least agree to three years, and I would prefer four. Five years is the usual limitation, and is the proper one.

I do not agree exactly with what has been stated by the Secretary of the Treasury. I think five years is not an unreasonable period for great offenses, but I am perfectly willing to take three or four years in other cases for the protection of the public. If the Senator from Arkansas will agree to three years I will make that motion.

Mr. HOAR. I do not remember whether I was present when this bill was considered in committee, but I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that there are many districts in the country where the grand jury does not meet oftener than once in six months, and I understand there are some where they do not meet more than once a year. This bill makes the period of limitation proceed from the time of the commission of the offense to the finding of the indictment, so that it may be practically a limitation of one year where the grand jury sits but once a year and of eighteen months where the grand jury sits but once in six months. I should think it might be desirable to make it at least three years.

Mr. GARLAND. The matter was very thoroughly considered by the committee. There was a very strong inclination on the part of the committee to make the time one year on account of a great many frivolous prosecutions that are got up according to the reports of the revenue department; but upon more mature consideration it was agreed to make the limitation just what was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and upon those recommendations the committee acted.

We think that every safeguard possible is thrown around it, because we make exception where a party is out of the district. We do not use the language "beyond the reach of legal process;" but if a man is out of the district the time shall be taken from the period of limitation; and we do not limit it as in the House bill to the proceedings on the case, but to the commission of the offense. We thought one year would amount to little or nothing. The present limitation is five years. There is something in what the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, to make the time three years; but taking the letters from the Department having control of these matters, the committee were unanimous that the time should be two years. It is now five years, and there is nothing to be lost by following the recommendation of the Department and making the time two years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Ohio repeat his amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will modify the amendment to three years, though I do it against my own judgment of what is best for the public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio proposes to amend the bill by striking out "two," in line 6 of section 1, before "years," and inserting "three;" so as to read:

Within three years next after the commission of the offense.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas whether he could not make a distinction between ordinary offenses or misdemeanors and the higher grade of crimes, and have the one barred in two years and the other in four? In the case of the graver crimes, where there is a greater inducement to commit them and a greater care in concealing them, the time should be longer. If the Senator will permit an amendment that will make a distinction between the grave crimes and the misdemeanors or minor offenses, I should be very willing to say two years for the lesser offenses. But otherwise, if we must make a general rule for all, I think three years is short enough.

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it seems to me the experience of the Internal-Revenue Bureau, having had charge of the entire workings of that system from its beginning, should be conclusive. We have heard the statement the Commissioner submits to Congress that there has rarely ever a conviction been had where the indictment was found more than two years from the commission of the alleged offense, and yet large numbers of prosecutions at expense to the Government, at great annoyance to the citizens, have been instituted, and almost if not the whole of the odium that rests upon the internal-revenue system grows out of these vexatious prosecutions, and not out of the law itself. In my own judgment two years is perfectly safe to the Government and is an ample time for the institution of prosecutions for every offense that may be committed under the internal-revenue laws. I therefore hope the amendment of the Senator from Ohio may be disagreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. It seems to me that the argument of the Senator from Tennessee is rather directed against the prosecution of offenses by the Attorney-General's Department. His argument is that the Department of Justice is so careless and negligent and so much addicted to frivolous prosecutions that the time ought to be shortened one-third within which the Department may prosecute. It strikes me the proper remedy is rather to see that your Department of Justice shall not engage unnecessarily in prosecutions; that that shall be more wisely cared for; and not to provide that these men shall only be prosecuted within two years. It is often very difficult, as the Senator knows, to develop the offense within a considerable time after its commission; and, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, the grand juries meet but once a year in many districts. It strikes me that this is altogether relaxing the grasp of justice too much.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Connecticut will allow me to say that the point in my argument, if it had a point, was that the experience of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue enabled him to know very much more and better than I can know, or than I think the honorable Senator from Connecticut can know, as to the true policy in respect to this matter. I prefer following his recommendation to following any opinion that I might have myself, in my want of information that I suppose that officer to be in full possession of.

Mr. HAWLEY. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, but he is not in the habit of surrendering his own judgment, nor am I. The error seems to be that the Department of Justice have frequently resorted to frivolous or useless prosecutions after the expiration of two years, and therefore the Senate should cut down the time within which the Department may prosecute to two years. I prefer to correct the error on the part of the Department of Justice, and not give these criminals so much time to enable them to bridge over the two years. If they can avoid detection for six or eight months where the grand jury meets but once a year, it is adding great facilities to this class of criminals.

One Senator spoke of a great number of frivolous prosecutions. I think he had better offer an amendment that there shall be no frivolous prosecutions after one year. That would befit the style of the argument.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to strike out "two" and insert "three" in line 6 of section 1.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALDRICH (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent from the Senate, and is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

The roll-call having been concluded the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sawyer,

Edmunds,	Kenna,	Sabin,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. As has already been said, this limitation which purports to be a limitation of two years is in point of fact in many districts but a limitation of one year, because the indictment must be found by a grand jury within two years within the commission of the offense. If the offense be concealed, or if it be discovered a year before the grand jury meet, it would be too late to make the prosecution. I move this amendment:

Provided, That where a complaint shall be instituted before a commissioner of the United States within the period above limited, the period shall be extended until the discharge of the grand jury at its next session within the district.

I think there will be no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the first section:

Provided, That where a complaint shall be instituted before a commissioner of the United States within the period above limited, the period shall be extended until the discharge of the grand jury at its next session within the district.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection to that, as far as I am concerned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. My conviction is very strong that it is not expedient for us to make easy the manufacture of distilled spirits in violation of law; and the frauds in the manufacture of whisky have been in the past so great, so enormous in extent, that I believe this bill would let down the bars too much. It is better to leave the law stand as it is. For many years the limitation has been five years. Therefore I shall be disposed to vote against the passage of the bill. I do not desire any division on the previous stages, but on the passage of the bill I shall call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether there is any exception here in the case of old crimes, any provision extending the limitation in case of concealment of the offense?

Mr. GARLAND. The exception is that where the party is out of the district the time of his absence shall not be counted. Let the Secretary read that portion again.

Mr. HARRISON. That is in the case of the absence of the parties from the jurisdiction.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. But does not the Senator think there ought to be some exception as to concealed crimes, where they are not discovered within the two years?

Mr. GARLAND. The whole bill is drawn on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the phraseology is adopted from their report. Let the Secretary read the whole bill again, and it will be seen just how it is.

Mr. HARRISON. That of course is authority which should have some weight, but it seems to me that the limitation is very short, and that it is in the interest of frauds against the Government, and that the limit ought to be extended, or that there ought to be some provision against concealed frauds, so that the limitation shall not run in case the criminals succeed in concealing the fraud for the two years.

Mr. GARLAND. It was intended to be very short. The Senator is mistaken. The Secretary of the Treasury recommended that it should be very short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill as amended will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any of the various offenses arising under the internal-revenue laws of the United States unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within two years next after the commission of the offense: Provided, That the time during which the person committing the offense is absent from the district wherein the same is committed shall not be taken as any part of the time limited by law for the commencement of such proceedings: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to offenses committed prior to its passage: Provided, That where a complaint shall be instituted before a commissioner of the United States within the period above limited, the period shall be extended until the discharge of the grand jury at its next session within the district.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I again call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this includes crimes committed by collectors of internal revenue who may steal—because that is the word—to the extent of a million dollars and conceal the fact by a system of fraudulent accounts; and the result will be that they may escape punishment by simply concealing their offense for two years. I beg Senators to remember that this is not the class of cases they seek to aim at. I have no doubt that the desire of the Senate is to relieve small offenses, little breaches of the internal-revenue laws, without any moral perception of the nature of the crime; but this extends also to defalcations by collectors of internal revenue, men who collect revenue by the millions upon millions, some of them ten, eleven, or twelve millions in a year. It will not do to make easy this kind of great offenses, which may be concealed very easily for two years, and in some cases they have been concealed for four or five years.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate will vote "nay" on this bill and let us have a little further time to consider it. I shall call for the yeas and nays on its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that if the bill on my file represents the bill that is under consideration correctly there is a very serious defect in the latter part of it. The proviso to the first section is in the following words:

Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to offenses committed prior to its passage.

The second section provides:

That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

Now, what law after the passage of this bill will there be applicable to the punishment of offenses committed prior to its passage? It seems to me that that leaves no act in force after the passage of this act applicable to those offenses committed prior to its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. As one or two Senators have come in since, I will again renew the motion I made in Committee of the Whole. I have no desire to defeat the bill if I can make it reasonable. I move to amend by striking out "two" before "years," in line 6 of section 1, and inserting "three" as the period of limitation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio proposes to amend the bill by striking out, in line 6 of section 1, the word "two" and inserting "three;" so as to read:

Within three years after the commission of the offense.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	McMillan,	Platt,
Allison,	Frye,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Blair,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Van Wyck,
Conger,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,	Wilson.
Dawes,	Lapham,	Pike,

NAYS—29.

Beck,	Farley,	Lamar,	Vance,
Brown,	Garland,	McPherson,	Vest,
Butler,	George,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Call,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Williams.
Coke.	Harris,	Ransom,
Edmunds,	Jonas,	Riddleberger,
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,

ABSENT—16.

Anthony,	Cullom,	Hill,	Manderson,
Bayard,	Gorman,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Camden,	Groome,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Colquitt,	Hale,	Logan,	Saulsbury.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM. I offer the following amendment to come in at the close of the last section:

Except as to offenses committed prior to the passage of this act, and as to such offenses the laws shall be and remain in full force.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that is indefinite. It says "the law." What law? I ask that it be read again.

The amendment was read.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that that lacks precision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. LAPHAM. I hope there will be no objection to this amendment. If we repeal all the laws which existed prior to the passage of this act, all offenses committed prior to the passage of the act will fall with that repeal and can not be punished. The only object of this exception is to save the laws in force as to offenses already committed.

Mr. PLUMB. That idea is not expressed in this amendment, or if it is I do not know the force of language. I think it will result in leaving the bill precisely as it was before the amendment.

Mr. LAPHAM. I will say "all laws applicable to such offenses shall be and remain in full force."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 396, being Senate bill 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senator will give way to me that I may move to take up the river and harbor bill. That bill will take a long time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the motion will be withdrawn. I should like to take up the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. GARLAND. This is a motion to take up the Des Moines River grant bill, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 17, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—17.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution.

Leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. 96) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase United States trade-dollars.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read in full.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase not to exceed 10,000,000 United States trade-dollars at their face value, and shall pay therefor standard silver dollars of the United States: Provided, Such purchase shall be made prior to September 1, 1884.

Mr. INGALLS. How does this come before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the joint resolution is introduced. It has been read the first time for information, at length. It will be considered read the second time if there be no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over until to-morrow.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call from the table a conference report on the joint resolution for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In pursuance of the request of the Senator from Connecticut the Chair lays before the Senate the action of the conferees on the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884. The resolution has passed the two Houses with Senate amendments, on which a conference has been ordered, and the report of the committee will now be read. Has the Senator the report?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The action of the House of Representatives will first be read, after which the report of the conferees will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 28, 1884.

Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the conferees will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) making appropriations for printing the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 4 and 5 strike out "314" and insert "300;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 6 strike out "fifty-six" and insert "seventy;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "162,500" and insert "200,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JOS. R. HAWLEY,
O. D. CONGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

A. M. SCALES,
WM. H. HATCH,
A. HERR SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. INGALLS. How does the resolution stand as amended, Mr. President?

Mr. HAWLEY. I can explain to the Senator. The Senate conferees were obliged to yield on the most important point to the House conferees. The original resolution provided for printing 400,000 copies of the report, and the Senate struck down the number to 325,000. The original resolution gave 314,000 copies to the House and 56,000 to the Senate. The Senate changed all these figures. The conference report is in favor of the 400,000 as originally asked for by the House. The number allotted to the House has been changed from 314,000 to 300,000, and the number originally allotted to the Senate has been changed from 56,000 to 70,000. The essential matter is that the House seemed extremely anxious that there should be the whole 400,000 printed. The numbers given to the members of the two Houses will not vary very much. About nine hundred copies will be given to each Senator, and about nine hundred and nine to each member of the House under this distribution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the report.

The report was concurred in.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move now to take up the bill known as the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I wish to ask consent of the Senator from Minnesota to lay this bill aside that I may move to take up House bill 2487.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senator will not make such a request. I desire to see if we can not get through with the bill to-day.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If the bill proceeds without further interruption I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to give notice that on Wednesday, after the close of the morning business, I shall ask to take up Order of Business 787, being a resolution to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Maria G. Underwood, administratrix of John C. Underwood, deceased, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the time and expenses of the said John C. Underwood in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Virginia, with a view of submitting some remarks upon the resolution. I will not ask it at this time, as it might interfere with appropriation bills. I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate for more than half an hour.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, in line 675 of section 1, after the word "improvement," to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "one hundred and seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Kentucky River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement, $175,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. At the adjournment of the Senate last week the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] discussed the amendment, and desired the Senate to refuse to concur in the amendment proposed by the committee. The bill as it came from the House appropriated $250,000, and the amendment of the Senate committee proposes to decrease that amount and make the sum $175,000. The Senator in his remarks did not confine himself exclusively to this item, but embraced in the discussion a subsequent item in the bill appropriating a sum of money for the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio. That will come up in its order. The Senate will bear in mind that these are distinct propositions entirely. The present item is as to the improvement of the Kentucky River on the present plan of improvement. I read from the report of the engineer:

1. Kentucky River, Kentucky.—The present plan of improvement adopted contemplates a slack-water system of navigation on this river from its mouth to the junction of the Three Forks, at Beattyville, a distance of two hundred and fifty-two miles. This required the repair of five locks and dams constructed by the State of Kentucky and the construction of twelve new locks and dams.

The operations of the past year have been confined to the repairs of these locks and dams, and maintaining navigation by means of them for a distance of eighty-two miles, or seventeen miles above the city of Frankfort.

It appears that in a distance of two hundred and fifty-two miles there are to be seventeen locks and dams, five of which are built and twelve to be constructed. In the appendix to the report of the engineer in charge, it is stated:

The navigation of the Kentucky River is at present greatly restricted by the existence of the bridges crossing it. There are three of these; one at Worthville, eleven miles from its mouth, and two at Frankfort, sixty-five miles from the mouth. The former and one of the latter are iron structures, belonging to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, and are unprovided with draws. A rise of six feet in this river, which is not infrequent, prevents the steamers from going above the railroad company's bridge at Frankfort, and if this is accompanied by a rise in the Ohio, even of moderate dimensions, navigation by steamer is entirely suspended, on account of the impossibility of passing the bridge at Worthville. The second bridge at Frankfort, and which belongs to the city, is also unprovided with a draw. It is two feet lower than the railroad bridge, and prevents the river steamers from passing above the city, except at extreme low water. This question is a very serious one in connection with the improvement of this river, and Congress is especially requested to take some action in regard to it. Another bridge across the river is contemplated at Tyrone, seventeen miles above Frankfort, and others are not unlikely to be constructed. It would therefore seem necessary, if navigation is to be continued, that some general law be enacted in regard to bridging this river, similar to that passed affecting the Ohio River, by which the height and span of all bridges may be made subject to the demands of commerce.

In view of these facts we thought an appropriation of $175,000 would enable the engineer to go on with the construction of this lock and dam for this year, and it would probably complete the repairs to all the other locks and dams, and that certainly is enough to expend in one year upon this improvement. The committee looked at the question very carefully and think the Senator should not ask the Senate to increase this amount. We do not propose to cut it down any more than to an amount sufficient to enable the engineer to get along with this particular work.

Mr. BECK. As I understand it, the former engineer died and there was some delay before Mr. Post could get his estimate fairly made, but he asked $480,000 and the House cut it down to $250,000. The only bridge that can possibly be in the way on that river will be removed before this work is done. The difficulty is that unless $250,000 be given a good deal of the work will not be put in such a state of forwardness as to make it available.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In July, 1883, there was still a balance of $72,894 available for this improvement.

Mr. BECK. I do not complain of the action of the committee; but I think $250,000 is the very lowest amount that can be economically used. When you observe that in the reductions which have been made of $426,000, leaving out the Muscle Shoals, which has been restored, $325,000 of all that comes out of Kentucky, it looks like a tremendous cut, and the only one that is really made, especially when there is a demand for so much more. I do hope the Senate will not do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The chairman of the committee will recollect also that Captain Post, in his letter which I read on Saturday, suggests that the repairs and expenses will amount to $48,000 and that the lock which they want to build this summer will cost $200,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. He does not give any accurate estimate of the cost of the lock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He does in the letter that I read on Saturday.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is a very general estimate. It has not passed through the regular official channels; it is not a regular official estimate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether or not the bridges over the Kentucky River which are said to obstruct navigation were or were not erected under a charter granted by the Legislature of Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They were. There is only one that interferes, however, with the navigation, and that bridge will be removed long before the navigation is ready.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understood from the report of the engineer, as read by the chairman of the committee, that more than one bridge is an obstruction to the navigation of the river.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There are several bridges on the river reported as obstructions, but the committee have no doubt that these obstructions will be removed; but until this is done, and in view of the amount estimated here, $380,000, the amount appropriated by the Senate committee is ample for expenditure this year, and a larger proportion of the estimate than is allowed to most other works in the country. I will not detain the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to make any speech, but merely to say that I hope the Senate will vote down the committee's amendment and let the bill stand as it came from the House in this respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House requested the Senate to return to that body the bill (H. R. 5682) to repeal section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1871, and to declare the forfeiture of the land grant therein made, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 6750) to amend paragraph 7 of section 2527 of the Revised Statutes; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 283) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 680 of section 1, after the word "Kentucky," to strike out "continuing improvement in pursuance of the last plan of the engineer in charge, $300,000; of which sum such amount as may be necessary, not exceeding $5,000, shall be expended in the erection of a stone pillar or pier on the southern side of the Indiana Chute, provided the engineer in charge shall decide that such a structure will aid in the navigation thereof," and in lieu thereof insert "$50,000;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Falls of the Ohio River at Louisville, Ky., $50,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will reject this amendment of the committee, not because this is specially a Kentucky improvement, for really there are other States more deeply interested in this project than Kentucky herself, and the canal around the falls is not properly chargeable to that State. It is a part and parcel of the Ohio River. The States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri—all the States above and all below, are quite as much if not more interested in this improvement than Kentucky herself. That very obstruction was what made Louisville a city; it is what made Jeffersonville a city; it is what made New Albany a city. Three cities have grown up there. This is a national improvement. All the boards of trade, the commercial bodies of Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, Memphis, and elsewhere have asked Congress to make the improvement recommended by the House. Eighteen steamboats have been destroyed in the last two years in consequence of the want of a proper improvement of that river, and I feel sure that the Senators from Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri, and their constituents are as much interested as I am.

I hope the amendment of the committee will be voted down.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The improvement now under consideration is one of a very different character from the one just acted upon by the Senate. That improvement perhaps had less merit than any item in this bill. As the Senate increased the amount in that case I do not know what they will do in this. It is a question here merely of judgment as to whether the Senate will enter upon a new improvement or not.

The United States purchased from a private corporation the canal at the Falls of the Ohio, for which we paid between three and four million dollars. We have removed all the charges for tolls upon the river, and have gone on with the construction and repair not only of the canal, but an improvement in the river which has progressed to a very great degree. There is still another and a new project now formed for the further improvement of the Falls of the Ohio. Upon that we have not yet entered, and the question is whether we shall complete the present improvements at the falls or go on and undertake another and a very large one this year.

The engineer in charge speaks of the present improvements that are going on there. In referring to Lieutenant-Colonel Weitzel's estimate, who was the engineer in charge in 1882, he says:

Lieutenant-Colonel Weitzel's estimate, contained in his special report of February 10, 1882 (report of Chief of Engineers, 1882, pages 1880 et. seq.), for the completion of the improvement of the falls proper was $242,088. Since that date there has been allotted for "Indiana chute"—

Which is a chute on the north side of the Ohio River to permit boats to pass down and over the falls through the chute in high water without going through the lock—

Since that date there has been allotted for "Indiana chute," from the appropriation for the Ohio River, $35,000, leaving $207,088 yet to be appropriated for the completion of the work indicated in his report.

In the estimates for the Ohio River I have inserted $50,000 for the Falls of the Ohio as the amount that can be expended if the season is reasonably favorable. The character of the proposed work is such that it can only be carried on when the Ohio is quite low, and as such stages are of uncertain date and duration it is necessary to have a fund in hand so as to utilize a favorable season whenever it happens to come.

* * * * * * *

It is a part of the approved project to narrow the opening at the head of the Indiana chute by two short sections of movable dam, each one hundred and sixty feet in length, so that during low stages the outlet through the dam may be reduced to a width of two hundred and eighty feet, while preserving the full outlet of six hundred feet for all stages during which the falls are navigable. The south section of movable dam is on hand, and is ready to go in as soon as a low stage in the river will permit. A vigorous effort was made to erect this section last autumn, but it proved a failure on account of high water. The breakwater and coffer-dam remain in place, and by contracting the outlet add materially to the difficulty of ascending the falls, but they can not be removed until the section of movable dam is in place.

There is no doubt whatever that the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio River is very important to the navigation of that river. The only question is as to how much shall be expended on the improvement this year, whether we shall take the estimate of the engineer in regard to the existing project, the one which is in process of completion, or whether we shall now enter upon this new improvement, which would require a vast expenditure. The lock on the south side of the river is sufficient to permit boats to go down stream or to come up at any stage of water in the Ohio River. In high water, however, boats do not limit themselves to the lock. In high water they can pass over the falls, and it is for the purpose of facilitating navigation in this regard that these improvements are asked.

In addition to this appropriation for the Falls of the Ohio River there are in this bill $600,000 appropriated for the improvement of the Ohio River. It is to be expended under the direction of the engineers in charge of those improvements. It is for the Senate to determine what they will do. The committee are of opinion that we should confine ourselves at this time to the appropriation recommended by the engineer in charge for completing the improvement to which he refers. We have submitted that to the Senate, and I hope the Senate will sustain the committee.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, it will be noticed that the language which the Committee on Commerce has stricken out is peculiar. Nearly all the appropriations made in the bill are made in the simple language "continuing improvement." We all know that the work is done under the direction of the Secretary of War through the board of engineers, and that the improvements are made in accordance with plans submitted to the board of engineers and by them adopted. It so happens that the plan which it is proposed here to adopt by enacting it into a law has never been approved by any board of engineers whatever. A new engineer was put in charge of the work there a year ago, and instead of proposing to continue the work in the line in which it had been going on for a number of years, he devised a new and elaborate plan for an improvement, one that is to cost a number of millions of dollars. It is proposed in this bill as it passed the House to adopt this plan.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the name of the engineer, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I am not able to give it, but it will be found in the report. My memory does not serve me as to the name, but I am giving the substantial facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. General Weitzel is the former engineer.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. But the engineer in charge developed a new plan some months ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him right there——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I wish the Senator would first allow me to make my statement. I do not desire to detain the Senate, and it is useless to be interrupted in a statement, because its force is thus entirely destroyed. I therefore must object to an interruption.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to ask a question.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Wait until I finish my statement. It happens that a major of engineers has been put in charge of the work. Not satisfied with the work as it was to go on in the original plans, plans which have been in operation and course of fulfillment for the last four or five years, he developed an entirely new plan, which is to cost a number of millions of dollars, and here, before the plan has been adopted by any board of engineers, simply upon the say of one engineer, it is proposed to restrict the Secretary of War and to restrict the board of engineers to this one particular plan. There has been no agreement whatever on the part of the Secretary of War or the board of engineers to take this plan. It is simply the recommendation of one engineer in charge of the work.

The improvement as it has been going on for a number of years since the Government came into possession of the canal around the falls needs but little more work, and the $50,000 was recommended by the other engineer who was in charge, and who was superseded, as being sufficient to carry on the work and maintain it and make the repairs on it for the year to come.

The Senate Committee on Commerce did not think it wise to forestall the judgment of the Secretary of War or the board of engineers and the Engineer in Chief by enacting into a law any particular plan, but preferred to leave it where all other improvements are left, with the Secretary of War and the board of engineers. The $50,000 provided by the committee is amply sufficient to continue the work under the original plans, and it is all that is asked. If the clause under consideration is not stricken out it will commit the United States Government to the extent of a number of millions of dollars upon a work entirely new and which has the approval thus far of only one engineer officer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I understand he is opposing this provision because he says it is new matter. This is an old canal. In line 355 I see there is an appropriation of $250,000 for deepening Gedney's Canal, Sandy Hook Bar, New York. That is entirely new matter. It has never been estimated for by any engineer; it has never been recommended by any; it has never been estimated for by the Secretary of War. There are five other instances in this bill of large appropriations, up to a quarter of a million dollars, four of them put in by the Senate committee, where the improvements have never been recommended by engineers nor estimated for by the Department. Yet the Senator complains that this work of continuing the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio, widening and deepening the canal to protect the navigation of that river, is new work.

The object of this improvement is to fix a harbor into which the boats intending to pass through the canal may be safely anchored until they can take their turn. I have seen three hundred and fifty coal-barges and steamboats waiting their turn to go through that canal. General Weitzel recommended that a distinct canal be dug for coal-boats alone, reserving the present canal for the steamers that navigate the river. Everybody at all familiar with the navigation of the Ohio knows that there is there a graveyard of canal-boats and steamboats and iron boats. The wing-dam built by the Government was built with the intention of benefiting the navigation of the river at high water, so as to deepen the canal on the Indiana side that boats might pass through it when the water was high. In low water there was not water enough in the channel, and in high water they could not pass through the canal well. By the construction of this dam the water is made so rapid through the Indiana chute that it can not be navigated in high water, either up or down, and the canal itself is submerged, so that navigation actually stops at a very high stage of the water at the falls at Louisville. That is an official report of the engineers found in the very volume from which the Senator from Minnesota has read.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he understands that the plan to improve the river found in the part proposed to be stricken out, the plan he has spoken of, is that of Colonel Weitzel for the construction of an independent coal-barge canal?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; it is the plan of his successor, Colonel Merrill. Colonel Merrill's plan is the one I am now advocating; but Colonel Merrill recommends his plan upon the idea that it will fit in exactly when the country is ready to adopt General Weitzel's plan of an additional canal for the coal-boats. His estimate is that it will save $4,000,000 over the plan as first proposed by General Weitzel.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is mistaken about that. The estimate as shown here for General Weitzel's canal was $3,102,517.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My recollection is that it was $6,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The cost of the improvement which Colonel Merrill suggests is $1,335,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator from Indiana will recollect that that does not include the condemnation of the cement beds. The whole estimate amounts to $6,000,000, and the plan of Colonel Merrill, as stated by himself, will save three or four million dollars by waiting until the cement company have quarried out their rock. Then it will cost less, and the channel will already have been sunk by the very process of quarrying by the cement company, which is now going on.

Mr. President, this is a work which is as beneficial to the whole country as it is to Kentucky, far more so indeed, because if we could return to the time when Louisville had 1,500 and 2,000 drays and hauled all the freight from Portland up to the Louisville wharf and from there down to Portland again, there would be a toll collected on all of it to some extent. There had been already collected $6,000,000 of toll until the Government took it and made it free. Now, let us make it capacious enough to accommodate all the commerce of that river. The engineers say it does not begin to do it, and that the obstruction put there by the Government itself renders the navigation up and down the river to the falls in very high water impossible. Boats wait below and boats wait above until the water subsides sufficiently for them to pass through the canal, for the dam which has been built has made the current too rapid for boats to pass up and down when there is a large body of water in the river.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it is important that the Senate should have an exact understanding of what is contemplated in the improvement described in the bill as "continuing improvement in pursuance of the last plan of the engineer in charge." That engineer, I understand, is Colonel Merrill, of the Engineer Corps. His predecessor at that station, Colonel Weitzel, reported, as the Senator from Kentucky has said, a proposition to construct an independent canal for the passage of coal-boats, leaving the present canal for the passage of steamboats proper. The estimate of the cost of the construction of that canal, not including, as the Senator has said, the property to be condemned, was $3,102,517. That report by Colonel Weitzel was made in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate passed in January, 1882, which called for a special report on the improvements still needed at the Falls of the Ohio to relieve the interest of the commerce of the Ohio River, and the report was made February 10, 1882. The engineer officer now in charge objects to that plan on account of the fact that its execution would involve the condemnation of the Louisville Cement Works at that place, which would not only involve the Government in a large expenditure to get the property, but would destroy a very important industry.

In place of that improvement suggested by Colonel Weitzel, Colonel Merrill suggests an improvement which contemplates enlarging the present canal by moving its northern wall to the northern line of the canal property, commencing at the pivot pier of the railroad bridge, and extending eastwardly to the intersection with the eastern boundary line of the property of the Louisville Cement Company. He estimates that the cost of that would be $1,335,000, and, as the Senator from Kentucky has said, he tells us that it will fall in exactly when Congress shall come to the opinion that the Government ought to construct an independent canal; that this work will all be available as part of that canal; that in the improvement the rock from which the cement is made will have been excavated by the cement company, which will greatly cheapen the construction of the work if the coal-canal is made.

It has been objected by the Senator from New York that no board has passed upon this improvement. I do not understand that we have had the advantage of the recommendation of boards upon all the appropriations which are recommended by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Most certainly, if the Senator will allow me, these recommendations come in, and the appropriations are made, to be expended under the authority of the Secretary of War. Before that is done the plans of the various engineers scattered over the country are submitted and adopted by the board. The work is carried out at all events under the direction of the Secretary of War, and he, through the board of engineers, of course, directs the expenditures. Here the proposition is that Congress shall adopt a particular plan which shall restrict the Secretary of War and the board of engineers to that particular plan, after another plan has been adopted and has been in process of completion for a number of years.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator's objection does not go to the question of the amount to be appropriated. If the Committee on Commerce had contented themselves with an amendment which would have made this expenditure subject to the approval of a board of engineers and the Secretary of War, the friends of the improvement at the Falls of the Ohio would have made no objection; but they have not considered that part of it.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If the Senator will go far enough back in the reports he will find that under the plans as they have been going on for a number of years the engineer recommends that only $50,000 is required, and we have given $50,000, and report it simply for the improvement of the falls. Therefore it is under the direction of the Secretary of War and the board of engineers. We have refused to adopt this new plan or to appropriate money for it.

Mr. HARRISON. Not only have the committee refused to adopt it, but they have refused to make an appropriation which would authorize the board of engineers and the Secretary of War to adopt it if it met their approval. In other words, this amendment elects between the old plan and the new; it elects that there shall be no new work done, and that the work there shall go on under the old plan, which did not contemplate the enlargement of the canal.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Is he prepared in a bill of this kind to adopt any new plan or method which may be recommended by a single engineer in charge of the work which is to involve an expenditure of a million dollars or more? Is he willing to put that into a bill and to take the authority and the power over the expenditure out of the hands of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers and the board of engineers which is constantly reviewing these matters? It seems to me that would be an unsafe way of legislation. The committee thought so; and we have followed in the line of precedents.

Mr. HARRISON. I have practically answered the question of the Senator already. If the Committee on Commerce will propose an amendment making this plan and this expenditure subject to the approval of the Secretary of War and board, barring the amount named in the bill as it passed the House, I shall make no objection to it. I do not desire to distinguish this appropriation from others in that respect.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It is distinguished from others by the very language which the House put into the bill, which is uncommon and irregular.

Mr. HARRISON. So it is; but it was perfectly competent for the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, instead of striking out the amount and striking out all of the proposition of the House, to have incorporated an amendment that would have made the expenditure of the amount of money voted by the House dependent upon the approval of the board and the Secretary of War. If the Committee on Commerce proposed such an amendment I should vote for it; but they do not propose it. The difficulty which the Senator from New York suggests is one easily obviated by an amendment. After all, this improvement practically has the indorsement of two eminent officers of the Engineer Corps.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Indiana is mistaken in saying that the appropriation recommended by the Senate committee distinguishes between any plans for improvement going on at the falls. The language of the item as proposed by the Senate committee is:

Improving Falls of the Ohio River at Louisville, Ky., $50,000.

Under that language the Secretary of War would be at perfect liberty to expend the $50,000 appropriated in any improvement that he saw proper at the falls; so that there is no limitation.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Either as to this plan or the old one.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Either as to this plan or the old one. The difficulty is this new improvement suggested by Colonel Merrill can not be accomplished until the property owned by the cement company is all exhausted.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is the fact as presented by the report. I refer to the plan as recommended by Colonel Weitzel.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is right in that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That plan, owing to that difficulty and owing to the immense expense, has been practically abandoned, at least for an indefinite time in the future. The proposition of Colonel Merrill has never been entered upon. He makes his recommendation to the Chief of Engineers, it is true, but the question is whether we shall, as the House has proposed, positively limit the power of the Chief of Engineers to going on with that improvement as recommended by Colonel Merrill, or whether we shall wait until a future time and see as to the propriety of entering upon that improvement. In the mean time the committee propose to make the appropriation of $50,000 for the falls, which may be expended in the improvement at present progressing there, or the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers upon consultation may determine to enter upon this other plan. Under the appropriation, as the bill came from the House, it requires the expenditure of the money in this new improvement. That would not be advisable, as the Senate committee believe, and we think that the improvement should go on as it exists, the Indiana chute being improved and ready for further improvement, and $50,000 being sufficient according to the statement of Colonel Merrill to continue this improvement and make it suitable for navigation there.

It seems to me that under existing circumstances and in view of the large amount required to be expended under the river and harbor bill this new improvement should not be entered upon until the necessity for it is exhibited, and until the Chief of Engineers and the officers in charge together shall come to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary. No one disputes the importance of the improvement of the falls. It is a question of expediency and propriety of expenditure at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the last remark of the Senator from Minnesota concedes the whole question.

One word in regard to some remarks which fell from the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], in which he said he was opposed to this great necessary public improvement because it was in the nature of new matter introduced upon the bill; that it had not come before Congress——

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me get through with my statement.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The Senator does not certainly desire to misrepresent me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not desire to misrepresent the Senator. He can correct me when I am done.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I said I was not opposed to the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio, but I was opposed to Congress exercising the power of adopting any particular plan; that I wanted it left to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers and the board of engineers, who are the only proper authorities to decide upon the plan. I am most certainly in favor of the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio, and have repeatedly voted for it in this body and the other, but I desire that Congress shall not decide upon the plan.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the objection of the Senator to be that the proposition of the bill does not come now before us, and did not come before the committee, recommended by any board. I asked him the question, which he did not answer, whether that was not the case with certain other improvements recommended by the committee involving the expenditure of $20,000,000 at least. There are five distinct improvements in the bill which have never been recommended by any engineer, by any board, or in any estimate, any more than this improvement has been. There is the mouth of the Columbia River, to which a large appropriation is made, and that appropriation will result in an expenditure of from two to five million dollars.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not until I get through with my statement. I can not yield in the middle of it. There is Gedney's Channel, to which I drew the attention of the Senator from New York. The bill proposes to appropriate $250,000 for that improvement, and there is no estimate, there is no recommendation from the Secretary of War. It just stands on all fours with the matter under consideration. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars were estimated, and the cost of the work will be from two to four million. There is the Black Warrior, an entirely new work, put by the committee upon the bill without the recommendations which the Senator requires now in the case of the falls at Louisville. The cost of the Black Warrior improvement will be from one to two million dollars. Then Sandy Bay, which involves an appropriation of from four to six million; and then there is the Cumberland River, involving from one and a half to two million dollars.

I am not objecting to any of these improvements. I have not investigated them. I have no doubt they are very meritorious, and will in time be completed by the National Government; but why is there such readiness on the part of the committee and gentlemen here to support measures like those and yet oppose an appropriation of $300,000 or $500,000 to as great a work as the widening of the canal at Louisville, when the demands of commerce are much greater there than in all the other cases? The commerce upon that river is more than the commerce at all these points put together, and yet the committee appropriate here the pitiful sum of $50,000, and they do not hesitate a moment about giving $250,000 or $300,000 to any of those new works.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. We all know that Kentucky is no more interested in this work than any of the other surrounding States, and that the argument of the Senator in favor of it is entirely unselfish. Notwithstanding, it is true that Kentucky with its inland rivers has been well dealt by in the bill; and many of the larger improvements receive in the bill as it came to the Senate in some cases 50 per cent. of the estimate, and in some cases more than that, whereas the average appropriation in the bill for the rest of the country in many cases is only 25 per cent. of the estimate, and in very few is it more than 33⅓ per cent. of the estimate. I know that that has nothing whatever to do with this case.

When the Senator called my attention to the appropriation of $250,000 for the deepening of Gedney's Channel, which is the main entrance to the port of New York, I supposed of course that it was purely facetious, and that he did not expect any answer to it. I am not disposed to compare in any way with any of the other improvements which are to be found in the bill the importance of the harbor of New York, which has thus far during all its history taken very little money out of the public Treasury. It now happens that in the changes which are being made in our great seagoing steamships many of them draw more water than is carried over Sandy Hook Bar and into that harbor into which comes nearly three-fourths of all the imports which arrive in this country and out of which pass more than 60 per cent. of all the exports. It will not, I think, strike the country as an extravagant appropriation that $250,000 has been given to the Secretary of War to initiate some movements, some operations upon that bar which may lead to its deepening. What it is finally to cost no one can tell.

It is ascertained, however, by the Chief of Engineers that an appropriation of $250,000 would enable him to undertake such measurements as would prove absolutely what could be done, and that we might be able to prove that it could be done for a very small sum comparatively; but if it should be found that its deepening would cost ten or twenty million dollars, I have no doubt that Congress is ready to undertake that work and give to New York an entrance which will be as deep or deeper than the entrance to any other harbor in the world. Therefore I do not care to compare the two appropriations.

I have not said anything against the improvement of the Ohio River or against the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio River. I have favored it always. The facts are simply as stated by the chairman of the committee. Some years ago we bought this improvement, and we have from that day to this been appropriating money liberally for improving the canal, as it is called. We have gone on and expended the moneys under the direction of the Secretary of War and the Chief of the Engineer Corps of our Army. Now we come to a bill which proposes to fix some particular plan, some new plan which has never been approved by the board or by the Secretary of War, and it is proposed in the bill to say that this new work shall now be begun.

For one I am opposed to it. I believe it is unwise legislation. It is legislation which is seldom if ever entered upon in a bill of this nature. Certainly all the moneys expended under the bill should be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War and the board of engineers, and Congress should not attempt to decide, for if we are to go fully into the question of the merits of the plan of the late engineer or the present engineer, we should be discussing this bill for a month. We have given here just what the old engineer asked, not 50 per cent., not 33⅓ per cent., but we have given all that he asked and all that is necessary to carry on the improvement as it has been carried on. But an engineer happens to have hit upon some new plan which he thinks will be better, and he has recommended it in his report. It has come before us, and here is an attempt to compel Congress to adopt his plan without any consideration, without any knowledge of its merits or demerits, and to put it into an appropriation bill and give $300,000 to have the work entered upon, knowing full well that after the work is entered upon it must necessarily be carried on from year to year, no matter whether the expenditure is $1,000,000 or $10,000,000. I say it is unwise, it is dangerous legislation, and the Senate can not afford to retain this provision in the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss the amendment. I rose to correct the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I presume he desires to be correct. It is not true that there has been no recommendation of the board of engineers for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia. The mouth of the Columbia was examined by a board of engineers by the express authority of Congress, who were authorized to report a plan. A plan has been reported for the improvement of the mouth of the river and recommended by the Chief of Engineers. I merely desire that it shall be understood that the Senator was incorrect in his statement; that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. As the Senator from New York seems to base his position, and that of the committee, largely upon the fact that this plan of improvement has not received the sanction of the Secretary of War or of the board of engineers, I propose when it is in order, if it is not in order now, to add after the word "charge," in line 681, the words, "subject to the approval of the plan by the Secretary of War."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is in order at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I move, in line 681, in the part proposed to be stricken out, after the word "charge," to insert "subject to the approval of the plan by the Secretary of War;" so as to read:

Continuing improvement in pursuance of the last plan of the engineer in charge, subject to the approval of the plan by the Secretary of War, $300,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee as amended.

Mr. McMILLAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. The question is not fully understood. Is the question on agreeing with the committee to strike out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce, to strike out and insert, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered?

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I was paired on all questions with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]. That pair has been transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 27; as follows:

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to agree to lay aside informally the business before the Senate in order that I may ask for the present consideration of a joint resolution from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the river and harbor bill be informally laid aside for the purpose suggested by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that House joint resolution 283 be laid before the Senate.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 283) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read in full for information.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It continues and makes available for a period of five days all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1884, unless the regular appropriations therefor provided in bills now pending in Congress shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885; and in case the appropriations or any of them hereby continued are insufficient to carry on the necessary operations of the Government, it appropriates a sufficient amount to carry on the same, but no greater amount shall be expended therefor than shall be in the same proportion to the appropriations for the fiscal year 1884 as five days' time bears to the whole of that fiscal year. Authority is also granted for continuing during the same period the necessary work estimated for public printing and binding, and for all other miscellaneous objects embodied in the sundry civil and naval appropriations acts in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made for such objects, and all sums expended under this act shall be charged to and deducted from the appropriations for like services for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa who is to determine what are necessary appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. Under existing law, of course.

Mr. HOAR. But that is not what it says. Let the Chief Clerk read the first three lines of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The part indicated will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws, which shall remain unprovided on the 30th day of June, 1884," &c.

Mr. HOAR. It is only the appropriations for "necessary operations." All that are unnecessary are not provided for. What does that mean?

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is a fair presumption that there are no unnecessary appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. For instance, take the appropriation for printing the RECORD, the printing of the speeches—is that a necessary operation of the Government?

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose it would be so considered by the Public Printer. He would like to continue to print the speeches, and they will be printed.

Mr. HOAR. Why is his concurrence necessary? Why provide that "appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government" shall be continued?

Mr. ALLISON. I think that would be the better phraseology. This is a House resolution, which came to us. It is absolutely necessary that something should be passed to-day.

Mr. HALE. It is the language that has usually been employed.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, we have used substantially the same phraseology heretofore when appropriations have been extended.

Mr. HOAR. I think if we were to call that language to the attention of the very astute First Comptroller all the speeches made in this body except those of my friend from Iowa would be stricken out. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think it would require more than one volume of decisions. [Laughter.] It is necessary that the joint resolution should pass to-day in order to carry on the operations of the Government. The resolution contemplates an adjournment by Saturday night. I merely call attention to that to show that there will be a further extension necessary unless Congress shall adjourn before Monday morning.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Prior to resuming the consideration of the river and harbor bill, the Chair will lay before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives requesting the return to that body of the bill (H. R. 5682) to repeal section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1871, and to declare the forfeiture of the land grant therein made, and for other purposes. If there be no objection the order will be entered. The Chair hears no objection and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House, in compliance with the request of the Senate, returned to the Senate the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to said bill numbered 8, 9, 10, and 11.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PLUMB. I now make the motion which I made this morning in regard to a conference on the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to that bill and ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. INGALLS, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. COKE were appointed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to submit the report of the committee of conference on the Indian Appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will first report the action of the House of Representatives upon the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 30, 1884.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will announce the action of the House upon the conference report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 792 of section 1, to strike out:

Which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, estimates, and recommendations of a board of engineers consisting of three members, who shall be assigned by the Secretary of War for that purpose, one of whom may be a member of the Mississippi River Commission.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That a commission to be called the Missouri River Commission is hereby created, to consist of five members.

That the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint five commissioners, three of whom shall be selected from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, and two from civil life, one of whom at least shall be a civil engineer; and he shall in like manner fill any vacancy in said commission; and he shall designate one of the commissioners appointed from the Corps of Engineers to be president of the commission. The commissioners appointed from the Corps of Engineers shall receive no other pay or compensation than is allowed them by law, and the other two commissioners shall each receive for their services pay at the rate of $2,500 per annum, out of any money appropriated for the Missouri River; and all said commissioners shall remain in office subject to removal by the President of the United States.

Mr. JONAS. I move to strike out from line 952 all down to the word "to," in line 955, and to insert the word "for."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state again what he proposes to strike out?

Mr. JONAS. From the word "channel," in line 952, down to and including the words "applied to," in line 955, and to insert the word "for," and at the end of the clause to insert: "$250,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana to the amendment of the committee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 952, after the word "channel," it is proposed to strike out the following:

Provided further, That of said first-mentioned sum the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to.

And to insert in lieu thereof the word "for," and after "place" insert "$250,000;" so as to make the committee amendment read:

For the protection of the harbor of Memphis, Tenn., and the work already done on the same by the Government against destruction by the washing and erosion of the east bank of the Mississippi River at that place, $250,000.

Mr. JONAS. My object in offering the amendment is to provide that no portion of the sum used for the harbor of Memphis, which I presume is eminently necessary, shall be taken from the appropriation for carrying on the work of the improvement of the Mississippi River as estimated for by the Mississippi River Commission. The appropriation made for that purpose is already $1,400,000 less than the sum asked for by the commission. In my opinion the whole amount should be appropriated, and I presume an amendment will be offered for that purpose, as one has been submitted in the Senate and referred to the committee.

It is especially desirable that the appropriation as made should not be further reduced by taking from it and appropriating to the particular purpose of improving the harbor of the city of Memphis the sum of $250,000, one-fifth of the whole amount. The bill originally provided that out of the sum for the Mississippi River the harbors of New Orleans, Vicksburg, Memphis, and other places should be improved, protected, and kept in order. That was for the ordinary wear and tear incidental to the use of those harbors, but there was no intention to provide in that appropriation for the emergency which has fallen upon the harbor of Memphis which threatens it with complete destruction. This information has been brought to Congress and to the committee since this bill passed the other House. The amendment has been put on by the committee of the Senate. I am prepared and ready to vote for it; but I think it should be an independent appropriation and not come out of the amount appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. CONGER. In the body of the bill itself Memphis is provided for to whatever extent is necessary, but the friends of that measure desired to have a particular sum or so much as was necessary set apart here. It would come out of the general appropriation, any way, as do all the improvements of the harbors maintained along there. But those who were desirous that the harbor of Memphis should have a particular appropriation desired to have it specified, and we put in just what we finally thought was necessary to protect that harbor. We have also put in Columbus, another place that was not in the bill of the House, to be protected as a harbor. The same objection to putting in any new places unless appropriations are to be made for the harbors along there would apply. We have pursued the recommendations of the engineers and it is in accordance with the wishes of the Senators representing the State in which Memphis is. Although Memphis is provided for to whatever extent may be necessary in the body of the bill, the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana will add $250,000 to the bill.

I am of the opinion that this is properly provided for. The appropriation is mainly for the improvement of these harbors. There is no need of deepening the channel down there. The object is to protect the harbors. The channel itself is deep enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana will be adopted. The estimates made by the Mississippi River Commission exceed in amount the appropriations made by the committee more than a million dollars. At the time of the estimates, as was remarked by the Senator from Louisiana, the extraordinary damage that has been done to the harbor of Memphis had not occurred. This large amount of money has been rendered necessary to be appropriated by Congress since the estimates made by the Mississippi River Commission.

I agree that the sum of $250,000 ought to be appropriated to the harbor at Memphis, but with a very small appropriation allowed to the Mississippi River as compared with its merits and as compared with the estimates of the Mississippi River Commission. I think it is unfair and unjust that this large sum shall be subtracted and abstracted from the amount appropriated for the Mississippi River.

I hope the amendment will prevail. At a subsequent stage I meant to present the claims of the Mississippi River for larger appropriations than have been allowed by the committee. This will provide for the present.

Mr. CONGER. The bill introduced in the Senate was for an advance of $250,000 to be taken out of the appropriation when the general appropriation should be made. It came so near the time when this bill was to be passed that we expressed it here instead of passing a separate bill. There is some time when these requests that are asked ought to have weight with the Senate when recommended by the Committee on Commerce. We leave it just exactly as it was before and as it was proposed to have it by the bill introduced for the relief of Memphis, $250,000 to be appropriated by special bill; but it did not pass as a special bill, and we have put it in here to be taken out of the general appropriation. The appropriation is for this very purpose, only it is specific in amount. It is twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars more than was estimated for in the original bill and we have specified it in this.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana is agreed to, will it or will it not add $250,000 to the aggregate of the bill?

Mr. CONGER. It adds $250,000 to this item, which is already liberal, for there is a good deal of money on hand for the river which has not been expended as yet owing to high water in the river.

Mr. GIBSON. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether this appropriation has been made in consequence of any recommendation of the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. McMILLAN. Not from the Mississippi River Commission directly, but the statement comes officially to the committee from the engineer of the Mississippi River Commission that the appropriation for the harbor of Memphis is a necessity, and I think the amount he asked for was $300,000. That is my recollection.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there is a condition of things existing in respect to the current of the Mississippi, its effect upon the eastern shore, that threatens the entire destruction of that harbor and the foundation of the custom-house as well as the marine hospital. The freshets of the last spring washing away points above have thrown the whole volume of the current of that river against that bank, and the destruction within the last three months has been unprecedented.

The amount suggested of $250,000 appropriated to that harbor for its protection and improvement, as well as of the site of the custom-house and of the marine hospital, is absolutely necessary.

So far as that harbor is concerned the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is as satisfactory to myself as the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce. The estimate made within the last three or four weeks by the engineer in charge of the work shows that $350,000 is necessary for the work to be done at that harbor, and I quite agree with the committee in believing that $250,000 appropriated at this time will be amply sufficient until Congress will have an opportunity of considering the question again and making such further appropriation as may be necessary if any others are found to be necessary.

Now, as to whether the $250,000 shall be taken from the $1,250,000 appropriated by the House bill to the improvement of the Mississippi River and the various harbors upon it from Cairo down to the mouth, or whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana shall be adopted, of course I as the immediate representative of the Memphis harbor have no choice. I have stated with earnestness the fact that $250,000 in the form of an additional appropriation or in the form of a specific appropriation out of the $1,250,000 here appropriated is absolutely necessary to that harbor. I refer to the Committee on Commerce and to the Senator from Louisiana the question as to whether it shall be in the form of an independent appropriation or specifically appropriated from the $1,250,000. I certainly have no desire to take from any other harbor a single dollar that is necessary to be expended upon such point; I only urge affirmatively the absolute necessity of the $250,000 provided for that harbor.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does it appear that this sum is taken from the general appropriation for the Mississippi River?

Mr. HARRIS. The committee amendment takes it from the general appropriation. The House appropriated $1,250,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River from Cairo to the mouth of the river, and the improvement of all the harbors between those points. The condition of things now existing at Memphis, and the great danger to which the harbor and custom-house and the marine hospital are to-day exposed, is a thing of the last three months, occurring long after the date upon which the report of the Mississippi River Commission is based. The evil did not exist at the time the report was made—at the time the data from which the bill is made were collected.

Mr. GIBSON. I have no purpose to antagonize the appropriation for the harbor at Memphis, but I suggest to Senators that applying a specific amount for the improvement of particular points on the Mississippi River independently of the judgment of the commission appointed for its improvement is a reversal of the policy which has been adopted by the Government. Anterior to the creation of the Mississippi River Commission, which under the law was required to bring in a specific plan for the treatment of the whole river, appropriations had been made from time to time for the improvement and protection of particular localities on the river, and in every instance the money so appropriated was lost, sunk in the waves of the river itself. We had appropriations made to protect the harbor of New Orleans. The engineers had furnished plans for the treatment of the harbor, and when the test was applied those plans were found wholly inadequate, and the result was that every dollar of the money thus appropriated was lost, and the history of those appropriations made for specific points had been an utter failure.

It was for this very reason that the general commission was appointed by the Government, because it was found by experience necessary to create some agency in order to ascertain the laws that controlled this great inland sea, and it is believed to-day by the engineers upon the commission, by the engineers of the Army, by intelligent men all over the country who have given attention to this subject, that the plan for the treatment of the Mississippi River devised by the Mississippi River Commission is based upon correct principles, as, in the language of Professor Hilgard, of the Coast Survey, the commission has discovered the laws that control the river.

Mr. President, the difficulty about the Mississippi River is that the cause that may produce damage in one place is not located in that particular place, but it may be four, five, or twenty miles away, and therefore I assert that the difficulty which we are contending against at the harbor of Memphis can only be remedied by treatment perhaps fifteen or twenty miles distant from the city of Memphis. The Mississippi River is not like an ordinary stream; it is more like a living organism; its parts are interdependent. The disease and difficulty which the people contend against who are aiming to treat that river are not local but constitutional, and the plan the Mississippi River Commission has proposed is all-embracing. It includes all the phenomena of the river. It is general in its application. Step by step they propose to regulate the low-water navigation, and the high water, the flood stages of the river. It is therefore a departure from the general policy of the Government, a departure that the experience of our treatment of this inland sea warns us not to make, to say that $250,000 of the amount allowed the Mississippi River Commission shall be expended in a particular spot when under the judgment of that commission the remedy for the particular difficulty existing there may have to be applied fifteen or twenty miles from it. It is not like a wave ebbing and flowing to the sea, but the monster force that controls this great river is such that while the current washes away at one point it bears with undue force on another, a distant point, sometimes fifteen, sometimes twenty, sometimes fifty miles distant; and you can not remedy the difficulty, I say again, by applying your remedy to the point where the current comes in contact with the shore, but you must go up stream, and there by your dike or your jetty divert the force at its incipiency.

I trust, Mr. President, at all events that the amendment of my colleague will be adopted. I know that this great stream, presenting a coast line of 2,000 miles in the very body of our country, is in no State, is in no man's district, but I think it appeals to every Senator here, while we are voting out millions for the improvement of its tributaries, to come forward actuated by a national spirit and readjust this great highway of the natiou.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, the appropriations for the Mississippi River Commission have always embraced certain harbors by name which were to be improved by them out of the funds appropriated. The harbor of Memphis has been mentioned in every appropriation bill that has been passed, together with some of the other harbors mentioned in this bill. What are the harbors mentioned here?

Improving Mississippi River from the head of the passes to Cairo, including the improvement and preservation of the harbors of New Orleans, Natchez, Vicksburg, Greenville, Memphis, and Hickman.

Those were in the bill that came from the House. The Senate have inserted "and Columbus," an additional harbor.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that no specific amount is appropriated for those harbors.

Mr. McMILLAN. I was just going to state the fact that no specific amount was mentioned or has been mentioned in all the bills that we have for the improvement of this river. It is left to the discretion of the Mississippi River Commission to apply whatever sum they see proper for the improvement of these harbors. The Mississippi River Commission can apply to these harbors any amount they see proper, and under this bill in the absence of any specific amount mentioned they would have ample power to apply this amount or a greater amount to the protection of Memphis Harbor if they saw fit. They have already contemplated the improvement of the harbor at Memphis, and they have already anticipated the injury for which this appropriation is made, not to the extent which has transpired it is true, but to a partial extent the very danger which has happened and the further danger which threatens has been anticipated by the commission and a sum of money estimated in their report for it. But the injury has been so sudden and so much greater than was anticipated that it was esteemeed a necessity that a specific amount should be designated by Congress in an appropriation bill for this emergency in order that the harbor at Memphis might be protected.

It is nothing but fair that this amount should come from the sum appropriated for the Mississippi River. This is one of the harbors mentioned in the bill, one to which the commissioners could apply the money. It may be that the language of the bill may operate as a limitation upon the Mississippi River Commission, rather than authorizing them to spend a greater amount than they would consider necessary. Three hundred thousand dollars was the amount stated, by I think General Comstock, who is the engineer member of the Mississippi River Commission in regard to the harbor at Memphis. The board of trade and the citizens of Memphis have been before the committee in large numbers, and have been urgent in their demands for such an appropriation; and it is reasonable that it should come from this general appropriation in view of the amount that has been already appropriated and is still in the hands of the commission, because the fund is not altogether expended. I think there was an unexpended balance at the last report of between one and two million dollars, nearly $2,000,000.

Mr. GIBSON. Allow me to say that I understand the Mississippi River Commission asked for $4,675,000 to be expended in the next year for the improvement of the river, not to speak of the harbors on that river at all.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I spoke of the amount that was on hand according to the report of the engineer. The balance available was between one and two million dollars; perhaps $1,900,000 or thereabout. That is my recollection. So this amount would be additional to the item of appropriation for the Mississippi River, adding $250,000 to that, and of course to the aggregate of the bill. In view of the fact that this harbor is mentioned there, and comes within the jurisdiction of the commission, I think it proper to let it stand.

Mr. GIBSON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the estimate of the Mississippi River Commission for the improvement of the river without reference to the harbors. The total amount is $4,675,000, and the amount allowed by this bill——

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator will find $200,000 additional on page 22.

Mr. GIBSON. I understand that item is carried on the sundry civil appropriation bill. The amount allowed by this bill is only $1,250,000, when the commission asked for $4,675,000 for the improvement of the river, and of that $1,250,000 for the improvement of the river $250,000 is taken away from it by this bill as reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. President, I appeal to Senators if we have embarked upon a plan for the improvement of the Mississippi River not to dole out to that great river a niggardly sum. It is a great river, and the report of the engineers shows that the improvements to-day proposed are necessary to preserve that river as a highway of commerce. The whole Mississippi Valley from the Alleghany Mountains to the Rocky Mountains, with its forty-three mighty rivers, its 50,000 miles of tributary streams, is dependent at last upon the navigability of the great river, the basin from Cairo to the head of the passes. Why should you vote here millions of dollars to improve the Missouri and the Tennessee and the Cumberland and the Ohio? Why should you vote over $5,000,000 to open the mouth of the Mississippi River, the gateway to the great valley, and yet allow only the paltry sum of a million dollars to carry on this great work, which is to bring us deep water from the passes to Saint Louis? When the engineers ask for nearly $5,000,000, we give them $1,000,000. I venture to say that in this appropriation bill it is out of all proportion to the sum allowed to any one work on any trout stream in the highlands of the country, or any one of the tributaries of this great river, or any work on the Atlantic seaboard, or on the lakes. Here is an utterly disproportionate sum allowed to that which is called for by the engineers of the country for the improvement of our greatest national highway.

The plan that they have devised is after experiment. It is not building a dam so as to keep water in the river; it is not to slack-water the navigation of the Mississippi River; it is not to build a canal around shoals anywhere; but the plan adopted by the Mississippi River Commission is to lift up these great sand-bars in reaches of forty miles long and thirty miles long, to carry them by the accumulated velocity of the current to the deep sea where within the last two or three years there has been discovered by the Coast and Geodetic Survey a basin equal in area to the State of Georgia two miles and a half deep, a current bearing steadily from the east to the west, so that when Eads lifted up the bar at the mouth of the river by his levees or dikes or jetties—call them as you please—and tumbled it into this deep basin, no trace of it could have been discovered, no trace of it has been discovered in spite of the prophecies of the engineers.

The plan which these engineers have agreed upon for the improvement of the Mississippi River has received the special approval of three Congresses of the United States. Six long, weary years were consumed in the Congress of the United States in order to get the commission and the surveys that were made by the commission; and now, when the great work is going forward, commending itself by its success to every committee which has visited it from either House of Congress, shall we dilly-dally with it? Shall we say to the people of the great valley of the Northwest, "Your wheat may rot in your fields; your corn may be used for fuel; we will improve the small rivers of the country; we will vote millions of dollars for the improvement of the tributaries of this river, but inasmuch as the great basin itself is in no State and in no member's district, we will dole out but the pitiful sum of a million dollars to this commission; we will take a quarter of it and give it for the improvement of one harbor along the Mississippi River out of the amount for that great inland sea," presenting, as I said before, a coast line of 2,000 miles, every particle of which requires observation and treatment of some kind according to some systematic plan?

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana will meet the approval of the Senate.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Minnesota, thinks that it is eminently proper and right that this increased appropriation of $250,000 for the harbor of Memphis should come out of the sum appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River. That appropriation for the Mississippi River was in the bill received from the House of Representatives. It was but a small proportion of the amount asked for by the Mississippi River Commission for the prosecution of this work. We were in hopes, and I am in hopes yet, that we shall be able to increase this appropriation so as to more nearly meet the amount required for the prosecution of this great work. But we are told by the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of this committee, that it is eminently proper that it should be reduced in the Senate by the amount of $250,000, which he and his committee propose to take from it for a particular work.

When this bill came from the House there was no application for this large appropriation for the harbor of Memphis; the emergency had not been brought to the attention of Congress; the engineers had not asked for an extraordinary sum for that work. The harbor of Memphis, like the harbor of New Orleans and the harbor of Vicksburg, was included in the bill for such ordinary repairs as might be required from time to time, possibly amounting in the course of each year to a very few thousand dollars.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will allow me to say, which is exactly in the line of his remarks, that a committee from the Chamber of Commerce and the Cotton Exchange of Memphis arrived in Washington to represent this great necessity on the very day after the bill had passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. JONAS. I was about to allude to that. As stated by the Senator from Tennessee, when this bill had passed the House and arrived in the committee-room of the Senate, a deputation arrived from Memphis to represent the imminent destruction which was about to be caused to the harbor of Memphis by the Mississippi River flood then prevailing, which called for an immediate appropriation, I doubt not. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate have thought an appropriation necessary, and they have thought proper to recommend an appropriation, nearly if not quite equal to that asked for by the engineers of the Mississippi River Commission, for the protection, preservation, and completion of the harbor of Memphis, which would have been a continuing appropriation, extending through several years probably, not requiring more than ten, twenty, thirty, or forty thousand dollars a year for a term of years. The whole estimate for the completion of the harbor is about $300,000, if I remember correctly, and the Committee on Commerce give $250,000 of that amount now, while they extend to the great improvement of the Mississippi River less than 33⅓ per cent. of what is asked for by the Mississippi River Commission.

I have no objection to this appropriation; I have no doubt that it is eminently necessary and proper. Let it be made like other appropriations are made by Congress to meet special purposes and necessities national in their character and proper to be made, but let it not be taken from an appropriation already cut down beyond the necessities of the work which is under construction, already reduced more perhaps than any other item of appropriation in the bill, and eminently more necessary and national perhaps than any other item of the appropriation bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Louisiana is mistaken in saying that the appropriation to the Mississippi River Commission did not contemplate the improvement of certain harbors.

Mr. JONAS. It did of the ordinary amount.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It contemplated expressly the protection and improvement of this harbor at Memphis, and the commission itself saw that danger threatened that harbor and intended to apply a portion of the appropriation to that place. They thought $25,000 perhaps might be sufficient at the time they looked at the improvement. Since that an emergency has transpired which requires a greater amount; and are they not to apply this amount to the improvement of the harbor, a harbor expressly mentioned in the bill and a harbor which has been mentioned in every bill appropriating money to this commission since the creation of the commission? That has been contemplated here and they have it as a specific work, and the work which they have already done has occasioned this injury.

Mr. JONAS. The Senator from Minnesota simply confirms what I stated. The Mississippi River Commission included in their estimates work upon the harbor at Memphis to the extent, as he says, of about $25,000, and the committee respond by recommending an appropriation of $250,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. Because the emergency which has transpired requires it.

Mr. JONAS. The Mississippi River Commission asked an appropriation of upward of $4,000,000 for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River, and the committee respond by giving them $1,250,000, and out of that $1,250,000 they propose to take $250,000 for the harbor of Memphis.

Other Senators besides myself had the honor of appearing before the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and we asked that the appropriation should be increased $1,000,000, and our request has met with no response. Consequently I have the right to call it the appropriation made by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, because they have adopted the estimate made by the House, but the House did not propose to take $250,000 of that appropriation and give it to the harbor of Memphis. In the great emergency which has occurred since the House considered this bill, since the Mississippi River Commission, made their report, the committee of the Senate have made this appropriation for the harbor of Memphis solely on the evidence which has been brought to them, and that evidence justifies I have no doubt an appropriation to meet the emergency, but does not justify that the money shall be taken from the appropriation made for the improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce what amount, if any, of the sum appropriated heretofore for the Mississippi River Commission remains unexpended?

Mr. GEORGE. Fifty-seven thousand dollars.

Mr. McMILLAN. According to the report of 1883 there was $1,900,000 in round numbers.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. At what time was that amount unexpended?

Mr. McMILLAN. The 1st of July, 1883.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. As I understand, that entire amount has not yet been expended.

Mr. GEORGE. I see, from page 23 of the report of the commission, that they make a financial statement and they say that on the 30th of June, 1884, there will remain of former appropriations the sum of $57,080.88.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will inquire right there what amount was expended by the commission the last fiscal year?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that I have got that before me, but that is the balance they state remaining on hand to-day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. My object in making the inquiry is this: if we know what amount was expended last year, we can infer what amount can be economically expended next year.

Mr. GEORGE. There was no appropriation last year.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I know, but there was an amount in their hands. Three million two hundred thousand dollars was appropriated two years ago for two years.

Mr. JONAS. For one year.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It was not covered back into the Treasury. It was a continuing appropriation, as I understand. So the amount appropriated by this bill is as much as was appropriated two years ago for each of the two years that have elapsed since that time.

Mr. JONAS. The same rule would apply to every other appropriation on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The same rule to a great extent is applied to every other appropriation.

Mr. JONAS. Not at all.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Now, it is claimed that the whole amount of $4,000,000 asked for by the Mississippi River Commission is not appropriated by this bill. As I understand it, the rule adopted by the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate is to appropriate somewhere from 25 to 33 per cent. of the amount asked for by the engineers. The amount asked for here——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator is not quite accurate in his figures. If it was $3,200,000 appropriated two years ago it would amount to about $1,600,000 per annum expended, but this is only $1,250,000, $400,000 short.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The amount that the Mississippi River Commission asks for is, as I understand, $4,000,000, and this bill appropriates $1,250,000, nearly 40 per cent. of the amount asked for.

Mr. JONAS. About twenty-five.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Forty per cent. of $4,000,000 would be $1,600,000. So I think the appropriation made for this work is quite as liberal as the appropriation generally made for other works which, although of not as great importance, are quite as important locally.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of some person who has the information whether the large appropriations which have been made for the improvement of the Mississippi have resulted in any great benefit to the river. I am aware that the opening by the jetties of the mouth has increased the navigation at that point, but since that has been done there has been more complaint sent up to Congress about the overflowing of the river, more applications for increased appropriations to preserve the adjacent country from overflow, than I had ever heard of before. I should like to know, if anybody has the information, whether the improvements of the Mississippi River have done any special good except to open the mouth to deeper-draught vessels. We have certainly more applications now for money to be applied to protect the banks and protect the people from the overflow of the river than we had before. What may be the cause I do not know; but the idea has occurred to me that in the stopping of some of the mouths of the Mississippi River by the erection of the jetties may have caused the waters in the Lower Mississippi to overflow more extensively than heretofore. I should like to have some information on that point.

We certainly ought not to blindly appropriate money so lavishly for that river unless there is some benefit derived from it, and I know the fact that there are more applications now for money to protect the people on that river from overflow than there were in former years. If the result has been that the stopping of the mouths of the river has caused increased overflows, it may become a question which we ought to consider whether these mouths should not hereafter be reopened. I should like to have some information. Is anybody prepared to give it?

Mr. JONAS. The information which the Senator from Delaware wants has been furnished to Congress repeatedly. If the Senator has not had time to read it, it is scarcely our fault who served on committees that furnished the information, but it would consume too much of the time of the Senate to give it now.

The Mississippi River Commission, who have charge of this work, have made annual reports of the expenditure of the money and as to the results achieved, in each instance showing great benefits to the navigation of the river, great improvement to its channel by the work, and a special committee of the Senate of which I had the honor to be a member and of which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] was chairman have reported to the Senate that they found everywhere gratifying and satisfactory results. They found that the money had been economically and properly spent, and that the system of works as originated by the commission and as now being carried out was eminently satisfactory in achieving the purpose for which the money had been expended.

So far as the overflows are concerned and appropriations for the relief of sufferers from the overflows, I say to the Senator from Delaware that long before I came to the Senate and before the jetties were completed, in 1874, more money was appropriated by Congress to relieve sufferers from floods than has been appropriated since, and at that time the mouth of the Mississippi was not closed up as the Senator seems to think it has been since, and thus the jetties can not be called to account for this great flood sent down by Providence, because it devastated the entire valley of the Mississippi. I would say to the Senator that if the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi which he considers may prove a stoppage to the flow of the waters out of that river shall be removed, it would be very possible and easy to restore the former condition of the river; that the depth of water at the South Pass, which is now twenty-six to thirty feet, on which vessels carrying six and eight and ten thousand bales of cotton pass out and in without the slightest difficulty or interruption can be restored to its former condition of seven feet of water at low tide, and we may have again the use of the Southwest Pass, over which no vessel in ordinary times drawing sixteen feet of water could pass, and the whole commerce of the Mississippi River and the city of New Orleans can be restored to its former condition of uncertainty and can be practically destroyed.

The jetties, in my opinion, have nothing whatever to do with the navigation of the river or with the periodical overflows we have had. They came from natural causes probably easily explained, but are not promoted or accelerated or aided in any degree by the great works which have been built at the mouth of the river.

I trust the Senator from Delaware will pay the compliment to the special committee of the Senate to read their report of their examination of the Mississippi River from Cairo to the head of the passes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GEORGE. I am induced, owing to the very great ignorance as to the great Father of Waters exhibited here, to present some further considerations against the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

In the first place, it is well known that the estimates of the Mississippi River Commission are over $4,600,000. One million dollars has been granted already by an act passed at this session of Congress. It is proposed now to give $1,000,000 more, or less than one-half of the estimate made by the commission.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate specifically to the weight which the estimates of this commission ought to have in relation to this great work as compared with estimates made by engineers upon works which have not been taken fully under the control of the Government as this has been.

In the first place, this is a separate organization. It is composed of five distinguished engineers, who have been commissioned by the Government to carry out the great work of improving the Mississippi River.

In the next place, this commission has a plant already acquired, on which large sums have been paid, which would be useless unless they have the means of using it in the work on that river. I want to call the attention of the Senate to some of the plant which this commission own. They own one hundred and eighty-nine barges, thirty-nine quarter-boats, four steamboats, three machine-shop boats, five steamboat tow-boats, one pumping-boat, twenty-five mattress-boats, four hydraulic graders, one steam-tug, and sixty-two pile-drivers. In other words, they have the outfit for employing all the money which they ask for. That this money is needed nobody denies. It is not even suggested by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce that there is not work enough necessary and proper to be done and which can be done within the time for which this appropriation is to run, within one year, to consume the whole amout of the estimates. Now, we stand in this position in reference to it: Here is a large plant purchased by the means of the Government; here are the officers, here are the men ready to go on with the work; here is the conceded necessity of doing the work; here is the policy of the Government recognized for a long period of years that the work shall be done, and now the committee comes and says, "We will cut off your appropriation over one-half," without giving any reason for it in the world.

The estimate of the commission is $4,675,000. One million has already been appropriated. Owing to the prevailing high flood in the river, it could not be expended. This bill proposes to give $1,000,000 more, which makes $2,000,000 out of $4,675,000, the estimate of the commission. Now, I ask Senators, where is the principle of business which authorizes us, with this large plant, with all these preparations to make the expenditure, with every machinery needed to carry on the work, when the men whom we have selected acting under oath say it will take $4,675,000 to do the work which they can do this year, I should like to know on what business principle we cut it down?

You may say you will not now or hereafter appropriate $4,675,000 to the improvement of the Mississippi River; you may say you will give $2,000,000 and stop. That would be logical; but to say you will only give $2,000,000 now and you will give $2,675,000 a year from now is very illogical, unless you will say that there is a want of funds in the Treasury to meet the appropriation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The remarks the Senator from Mississippi is now making would apply to every appropriation contained in this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not make any difference if it does.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It would make a great difference, because the bill then, instead of being $15,000,000 or thereabout, would I suppose be $100,000,000.

Mr. GEORGE. There is the difference between this and other works that I have pointed out; but the Senator from Wisconsin has not paid attention to my remarks. There is the plant already bought and paid for.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is so everywhere.

Mr. GEORGE. In all the little creeks and harbors named in the bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Have they steamboats and snag-boats and that sort of thing?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Everything that is necessary to go right on with the work.

Mr. FRYE. They all said they had, at any rate.

Mr. GEORGE. Then there is this objection, de minimis non curat lex. This is a big thing, and they are small things. Will anybody say on that side of the Chamber or on this side of the Chamber that you propose to stop the improvement of the Mississippi River with $2,000,000? If so, that ends it; it is logical then. If that is the determination of the Senate, if that is the determination of Congress, then the proposition of the committee is a logical one; but if we are to go on improving the channel of the river and building levees, as this very bill authorizes levees to be built, what is the use of keeping the money locked up in the Treasury when it can be usefully and profitably expended both for the general good of the whole country and to the great advantage of those who own land in the overflowed districts.

Now, Mr. President, remarking and calling the attention of the Senate again to the fact that this appropriation is a mere subtraction from the amount appropriated by the House of Representatives of $250,000, because the injury for which the $250,000 is appropriated has occurred since the report and since the estimates made by the Mississippi River Commission, I now call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to a remark that he made, and I desire to ask him his authority for it, and that was that this injury at Memphis Harbor was caused by the works which the Mississippi River Commission had put in the Mississippi River.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The statement is made that the Mississippi River Commission in carrying forward their improvements on the opposite side of the river a little above Memphis so affected the channel as to turn it over toward Memphis so that it strikes the levee or above the levee of the city of Memphis and is undermining it.

Mr. GEORGE. How does the Senator know that the work on the west bank of the Mississippi River turned the channel? The Mississippi River has a way of turning its channel without regard to anybody's work.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is the opinion of the people who live at Memphis and who represent its interests.

Mr. GEORGE. Then the Senator reports the opinion of the people at Memphis and does not report the scientific judgment of any member connected with the commission or any engineer.

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; they have not exercised any scientific judgment since this occurred, I believe.

Mr. GEORGE. That is a very poor way of deciding on the work of the commission.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I did not make this as a criticism of the Mississippi River Commission, or that they intended to put the work in such a condition as to effect that object. That was not my intention at all. I merely stated a fact.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know what the object of the Senator was in making the statement, unless to suggest to the Senate that the Mississippi River Commission was doing about as much harm or more than it was doing good, and that when it spent money at one place it required an appropriation next year of money to repair the damage which it did in another.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think that follows as a necessary consequence. If under the Mississippi River Commission a chute or a slough is closed up and the water is prevented from running out through that chute or slough, it necessarily must go somewhere else, and the result is what I have seen it in the vicinity of the town where I reside. The Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company built a bridge over the Mississippi River at my town, and they constructed certain auxiliary works in connection with the bridge. The effect of those works was to throw the channel of the river so strongly toward the Minnesota shore that within one month it tore it all to pieces, and they were compelled to go to work and rip-rap the Minnesota shore in consequence of the strong current which set from the Wisconsin shore, and that was caused by the auxiliary works placed in the river in connection with the bridge. I have no doubt it is so in many other instances.

Mr. GEORGE. That would only prove that the Mississippi River Commission that we have organized here at very large expense is incompetent to the discharge of its duties and that we ought to repeal the law which established it and pass another law and appoint the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Minnesota as the superintendents of the improvements.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That might be a very wise thing to do.

Mr. GEORGE. I think, notwithstanding the eminence of my friends on the other side who object to the Mississippi River Commission, the people of the country are better satisfied with the scientific survey and examination of the Mississippi River Commission than they would be with the unprofessional and unstudied opinions of any man not an engineer or of any community as reported by the Senator from Minnesota.

So, Mr. President, if we are to go upon the idea that the Mississippi River Commission do not understand their business, then we ought not to vote them a single dollar. If they are so ignorant of the principles of hydraulic engineering, are so ignorant of the laws that govern the Mississippi River as to spend money which, instead of doing good, actually does injury, then, sir, we ought not to appropriate a cent. Instead of reducing the appropriations for the Mississippi River a quarter of a million dollars, the committee ought to have stricken out the whole appropriation, because if no good is to come from it, if injury is to come from it, if these men know nothing about the business in which they are engaged, it is very evident we ought not to appropriate money to be squandered under their foolish and wasteful management. But I take it, Mr. President——

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. Does not the theory upon which the Mississippi River Commission was established imply that what might be beneficial to one part of the river might by possibility produce an injury to another part of the river, and shall we not infer from that the necessity of allowing to the Mississippi River Commission full discretion to determine just where they will apply the appropriations that we may make, so that in the treatment of one part of the river they may put up such works as may be necessary and essential to prevent damage from being done there in consequence of work that perhaps may have been erected higher up? I think, therefore, that the notion which has seized upon the citizens of Memphis that the damage done to their harbor may result from some work done higher up on the river under direction of the Mississippi River Commission may be true, and the Mississippi River Commission will provide, as soon as opportunity occurs and the means are allowed them, a remedy at Memphis or in the neighborhood of Memphis to prevent this damage.

The Senator from Mississippi, I feel sure, is in full sympathy with the general plan that has been adopted by the Mississippi River Commission, and I hope that he will draw no inference from the suggestion made by the Senators who have spoken in advance of me which would go to show either the incompetency of the commission themselves or the inadequacy of the plan which they have already submitted to Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana misunderstood me very much if he thought I supposed the commission were incompetent. On the contrary, I have the greatest confidence in their judgment and in the knowledge they have of the laws which govern the Mississippi River, and I think their reports show that they have mastered that interesting subject. I am not willing to admit that work done at one part of the river would injure another. I am willing to admit this, and you find it by the way from the reports of the Mississippi River Commission, that work at one point requires work at another point, and I want them to have money enough when they put a work at one point which would throw the current upon the opposite bank to make the proper security on that bank against injury. It is the niggardly policy of the Government which makes them do their work by halves which has caused the injury.

Of course if they have turned the channel from one bank upon the other there ought to be some protection upon the other bank; and it is because we have been so parsimonious in the appropriations so that the two works could not go on pari passu and at the same time that when the work on one side has been completed and no means left to do the corresponding work upon the other side injury may occur when a large overflow intervenes between the completing of the work on one side and the completing of the work on the other. That is the very thing I desire to avoid and that is the very thing which the Mississippi River Commission desires to avoid. They desire to have money enough that when they do work at one point they may be able at the same time to do all the necessary work at every other point which would be affected by the work done at the first point.

Mr. President, this committee by an amendment which they report to the bill recognize a very important fact and provide for it. The second proviso on page 29 reads as follows:

Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to repair and build levees if in their judgment it should be done as a part of their plans to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel.

The committee agree to that. The Mississippi River Commission in every report that it has made has expressed the opinion that the making of levees upon the banks is not only a useful mode of improving the channel of the river, but they say emphatically that it is the most economical way of improving the channel.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Mississippi will allow me to state that that is the language of the original bill authorizing the commission.

Mr. GEORGE. It was not in this bill when it came from the House, and the Committee on Commerce has indorsed that idea by offering this amendment, which I think is a very proper amendment. Now, sir, at first—and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to that—it was a matter of speculation whether levees would improve the navigable channel of the river; but the experiments and observations and measurements made by the Mississippi River Commission have put that beyond the line of experiment. It is now a settled question, and no engineer of any respectability in this country will deny that in a sedimentary stream like the Mississippi River a raising of its banks will improve the channel of the river.

Even General Comstock, who dissents somewhat from the rest of his associates on the commission, does not deny but that is the result; and I call the attention of the Senate to the measurements made by scientific men which prove this fact beyond all doubt. Measurements were made of four outlets produced by the breaking of levees in 1882, and below every single one of them there was a large decrease in the section of the river—that is, a large decrease in its bed, and of course in its power to carry off the water. Bonnet Carré, which had been open for years, was closed about a year ago, and then it was measured and it was discovered that as soon as that outlet was closed there was an enlargement of the channel just below the crevasse equal to 12 per cent. of its section.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Does the Senator mean a deepening of the channel?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; a deepening of it. These things are established. There is not a single observation made by any engineer which controverts or contradicts these facts. Here is the proof, that where the outlets occur there is a shoaling of the river just below, and that where they are closed up there is a removal of the shoal. This has been uniform. There has been no exception to it. Every one of the commissioners, including General Comstock, says that the raising of the levees to a certain height is an economical and proper mode of improving the channel of the river, and they state this very important fact, that as the river rises within the channel up to full banks the velocity of the current increases and the scouring power of the river also increases; but as soon as—and I desire to call the attention of the Senate especially to that—as soon as the water overflows the bank there is a slackening of the current and a deposit of sediment, because everybody knows that in a sedimentary stream the amount of sediment depends upon the velocity of the water. Whenever you slacken the current you make a deposit on the bottom of the channel of the river.

I may here call attention to experiments made in the Missouri River, a very sedimentary stream, where a wire gauze, if I may use that term—a wire net made of wire about the size of telegraph-wire with the interstices about a foot square was placed in the current of the river, and just the amount of slowing of the current produced by these wires, which would seem very little, raised the bank sixteen feet in one overflow. You can not diminish the current without making a deposit, and every time you accelerate it you give it scouring power, and it takes up more sediment.

Going back now to what I just remarked, as you raise the river you increase the velocity, you increase the scouring power, and increase the power to carry the sediment in suspension; and as soon as you get above the bank, as soon as it overflows, then the current by the cross action of running back east and west on the banks instead of downstream, you find a decrease in the velocity and a deposit. That means that if you will get the two, or three, or four feet additional bank necessary to hold the water within the channel, instead of there being a decrease of the velocity of the current when you get to the top of the bank, you increase it still more, because it is a law of hydraulics that as you raise the flood tide you increase the velocity.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to what the commission have said. They say it is not necessary in order to improve the channel that the levees should be raised so as to keep out an extraordinary flood, and therefore so far as the channel improvement is concerned it is not necessary to make levees on the banks of the river high enough to protect the country from overflow; and they say on that subject this which I desire to read to the Senate:

These facts suggest obviously the idea of a co-operation between the General Government and the communities interested in the prevention of overflow in the maintenance of a levee system, which shall serve at the same time the purpose of improving the channel and protection from overflow.

"Co-operation!" I desire to bring before the Senate the fact that the Mississippi River Commission have said that it is a part of their plan of improving the river to close by levees the front of the Yazoo basin and the Tensas basin. They have already determined that. That is the unanimous opinion of the Mississippi River Commission; nobody disputes it. They have said that they have determined to do it in order to improve the navigation of the river. Of course they can not do it without the money, and if you take the money away from them they can not do it.

Mr. President, I stand here to offer co-operation, provided you do not take away from the commission all means of co-operating with the local authorities. The last session of the Legislature of Mississippi passed an act levying a tax of 13 mills on the front counties of the Yazoo basin and 9 mills on the back counties, making that tax irrepealable until the bonds were all redeemed, and authorizing the issue of $500,000 of bonds for the purpose of completing the levee.

I wish the Senate to understand that two-thirds of that levee has already been built by those counties. There are gaps now, and those gaps are broken. Here are $500,000 offered by the Mississippi Legislature to assist in closing those gaps. The bonds have been issued. Owing to the tightness of the money market, attributable to causes which are well known to the Senate, those bonds can not now be floated at par and they can not under the law be sold for less. Yet there is a large and rich railroad corporation now building its road through that bottom, and they have offered to take one-half of those bonds at par if the legislation of Congress at its present session shall indicate that there is money enough left to the Mississippi River Commission to do half the work.

So this case is presented to the Senate: The local authorities have already done two-thirds of the work. A half million more is needed. A half million more will finish it and improve the channel of the river and save that immense, rich, and valuable country from overflow. A co-operation, say the Mississippi River Commission, is what ought to take place between the Government and these people. Here is the offer to do half the work or half of the remaining one-third, which means that the local authorities will do five-sixths of the work if the Government will only but do the other sixth.

In the face of that is it right, is it just, is it proper to reduce the appropriation? When our own officers, the Mississippi River Commission, say that that is the most economical way of improving the channel of the Mississippi River, when they admit that it is a work they intend to do, when the people of the locality to be benefited by the improvement come up and say, "We are willing to do one-half of the third that remains to be done," after having done fully two-thirds before, is it right for us to turn the backs of our hands to them and say: "We will not give an amount sufficient to enable the Mississippi River Commission to co-operate with you?"

I wish to state a few facts in relation to Yazoo Valley. In the first place, I will state that in area it is only one-seventh less than the delta of the Nile. It is as rich as that delta and only one-seventh less; that is, that part of the delta within the State of Mississippi in the Yazoo basin. The delta of the Nile contains about 5,800,000 acres of land.

There are about 5,000,000 acres in the Yazoo basin subject to this overflow. Two-thirds of that valley have already a sufficient levee at the lower part. One-third of it, about one hundred and four miles, remain to be built. Two-thirds of that has been built, the other third having been washed away; and now the people of that district propose to do one-half of the other third if you will allow your own sworn officers, your own commission, enough money to do that which they say again and again in every report which they have made is the most economical way of improving the channel of the Mississippi River.

I know gentlemen object to making appropriations for the improvement of private property. I object to that. I would not like to go and dig a ditch on a man's land or grade it for him or build houses on it for his convenience; but if there is a public work justified by public considerations, as this work is proven by your own officers to be, will you say that you will not do it because one of the incidents of this public work may be that it will benefit private property? Is that an objection in the minds of Senators? Your commission say the work is necessary to improve the river. Congress and every Department of the Government says that the Mississippi River must be improved.

Under these circumstances, when the people of the locality have done two-thirds and propose to do one-half of the other third, which will result in improving the navigation of that great stream, are you going to cut down your appropriations below what your commission, created by yourselves, composed of the ablest men of the Engineer Department of the Army, say is absolutely necessary to improve the navigation of the river and declare that it is the most economical way of doing it?

I think that instead of looking at it as being an objection from the fact that it benefits private property it ought to commend itself to Senators. Certainly it adds to the beneficence of a measure clearly of a public nature that while it is a public good, conferring blessings upon the nation at large, it also confers a private blessing upon the community in which the work is located.

Mr. President, I have told you something about the size of that valley. It has been overflowed now three years. In 1882 it overflowed; in 1883 it overflowed; and this year it overflowed.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator a question, because he is arguing at great length a proposition that the United States shall go into partnership with Mississippi and other States in recovering lands that are overflowed. Does not the Senator know that if on one river and harbor bill that work should be deliberately entered upon, there never would be another dollar appropriated to the Mississippi River in the world; that that would be the end of it?

Mr. GEORGE. The answer to that is found in what the committee itself have reported:

That the commission is authorized to repair and build levees, if in their judgment it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river, and to deepen the channel.

Mr. FRYE. Of course; but the Senator's proposition is that they should join hands for the purpose in part of recovering and saving these lands in favor of commerce.

Mr. GEORGE. That is not my proposition. The commission say that there ought to be co-operation between the local authorities and the United States Government. They say that in order to improve the channel it is not necessary to build the levees as high as will be necessary to protect the adjacent country from overflow. When the Mississippi Commission has to build a levee three feet high for channel improvement, and it is necessary to build a levee four feet high to protect the country from overflow, does the Senator from Maine object that the people who would have to build it four feet high put their work on the three-foot levee, and make that four feet high? Does he desire that the Government shall build a little three-foot levee on the inside in order to improve the channel and then on the outside the citizens are to build another one four feet high? That seems to be the strength of the Senator's objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to call his attention to what I understand to be the fact, that the levee which the commission recommends as in use in deepening the channel of the river in order to have its best effect must be built upon or near the bank of the river, whereas the levee for protection against overflow, as it is one that is to last and not to be a temporary structure as the other is, for its own safety must be placed remote from the river bank in many places?

Mr. GEORGE. I was interrupted by the Senator from Tennessee and did not hear the last part of what the Senator from Indiana said.

Mr. HARRISON. I was calling attention to a fact. I understand the levee, which is to be serviceable in connection with channel improvement by confining the water and so increasing its effect in deepening the channel should, according to the recommendations of the commission, be near the bank in order to get the value near and not allow any overflow, whereas the levees for the protection of land, and which are to be permanent and which must be removed far from the caving bank, very often would be placed a considerable distance from the bank of the river.

Mr. GEORGE. I will respond to the objection made by the Senator, and if he will give me his attention I have no doubt I can do it in such a way as to satisfy him that there is no force in the objection. His point is, that persons in building levees for the purpose of protecting the lands would probably build them back farther from the river than they otherwise would on account of preventing them from falling in or caving, and that the Mississippi River Commission in building levees would build nearer the banks of the river, and hence that the two lines of levees would not be the same. The answer to that is that the Mississippi River Commission would be as much obliged to select ground which would not cave on which to build their levees as the proprietors would be.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator does not appreciate the point that the erection of these levees in their relation to navigation is a temporary work, while in relation to land protection it is a permanent work.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit me to make a suggestion in reply to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. I will state to the Senator from Indiana that the proposition originating with the engineers who built the jetties at the mouth of the river to extend that system from the jetties to Cairo, was based upon the theory that when a continuous line of works on the bank of the river was made complete so as to hold within the channel, especially in the flood stages, the current of the river, and thus to utilize the greatest force in carrying the deposit and sand bars to the sea, the bed of the river would be lowered just as it was lowered in the jetties themselves all the way up from the jetties to Saint Louis, and that after several seasons of high water, during which the river itself when exercising its greatest power would have cleared away the vast reaches that are filling up its channels in its middle parts and in its upper parts, the levees themselves may be dispensed with, and that with a deepened channel the people on the bank of the river would be perfectly secure from disastrous floods.

Mr. HARRISON. I know Captain Eads had some impression that the construction of these levees, which would in effect be applying the jetty system to the Mississippi, would considerably lower the flood line of that river; but I say to the Senator from Louisiana that the Mississippi River Commission as now constituted do not believe, nor do I think any sane man believes, that the construction of levees or any other works in that river will so deepen its channel as that it would carry the entire floods such as passed down it the last year.

Mr. GIBSON. I beg pardon of the Senator from Mississippi, but if he will allow me one moment more, I understood the Senator from Indiana to say that the levees or dikes which the Mississippi River Commission propose to establish on the banks of the river are to be temporary.

Mr. HARRISON. So I said.

Mr. GIBSON. How can they be temporary if the cause is to be permanent?

Mr. HARRISON. Simply temporary, because the temporary use of them would effect that deepening of the channel which would be sufficient for navigation, but not sufficient to carry the entire waters in time of a great flood.

Mr. GIBSON. I venture to say that the Senator from Indiana can find nowhere in a report of the Mississippi River Commission any such theory as that, or that any engineer of the Government except Captain Eads has ever proposed to put temporary works upon the banks of the Mississippi River.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GIBSON. I beg pardon of the Senator from Mississippi for having interrupted him, and I thank him for giving me an opportunity to make this explanation.

Mr. GEORGE. Another answer to the Senator from Indiana about the necessity for putting the levees upon the immediate banks of the river in order to produce channel improvement is found in the report of the Mississippi River Commission itself. On page 20 of their last report they say that—

For about half the distance below Cairo only one side of the river requires levees.

That is for navigable purposes.

For the remainder of this side the hills are so near, at distances ranging from immediate contact to not over six or eight miles, that the loss of volume or discharge over the intervening strips of bottom land is not considered of grave importance."

So it appears that if the levees were actually set back four, five, or six miles they would not be materially lessened in value as a means of channel improvement. The levees, as now located upon the Mississippi River, are very near the banks of that river.

If the Senator from Indiana and other Senators will examine the reports of the Mississippi River Commission they will see that it is a part of the plan of channel improvement, a necessary and essential part of it, to revet the curves on bends in which the caving occurs. In other words, in order to have any improvement at all, if you discard the levees then in order to keep the channel of the Mississippi River from filling up you are obliged to stop the caving of the banks. That is one of the permanent and settled policies of the Mississippi River Commission, and if that is done there is no necessity for setting the levees back from the river. Any one who will read the reports upon that subject will see the necessity of preventing the caving of the bank and that there can be no improvement in the Mississippi River without preventing those caves.

But the Senator from Indiana said there was no sane man who believed that the levees could contain all the water coming down the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARRISON. No, I said no such thing; the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood it so.

Mr. HARRISON. I said that the bed of the river could be so deepened as to contain the water not in flood without the use of levees.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Eads believes, I think, that after the levees have been built for a series of years, thereby giving full force to the scouring power of the water, the bed of the river will be deepened so that levees will not be needed. I think he believes that, though I am not prepared now to show that he believes it. But that is not the question. The question is whether we are going to give the Mississippi River Commission the power, as the bill proposes to give it and as we have all along given it, to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River in any way they see proper, even by levees if necessary. If we do give them that power, then the next question is whether we shall allow them as a matter of economy on the part of the Government to unite with the property-holders in making the proper levees and in saving expense to the Government. I see no harm in that.

I said something awhile ago about the size of the Yazoo delta being wholly in the State of Mississippi. I propose to show somewhat of its productions and its population. The population in the counties which are entirely within the delta amounts to 98,622, of which 81,147 are colored. In addition to that, there are five counties partly in the hills and partly in the delta. Taking an average, you might say that one-third of those counties are in the delta and one-third in the hills. The population in those five counties amounts to 123,016, of which 56,272 are colored. The value of the agricultural productions of those counties inside of the Yazoo delta, leaving out those who are partly in and partly out, for the year 1879, independent of cotton, was $9,573,326. At the same time those counties raised 260,000 bales of cotton, which at $50 a bale would be $13,000,000; and all this with that small population.

I desire to call the attention of Senators who represent constituencies engaged in commeree to the value of these productions in the way of interstate commerce. A bale of cotton raised in any district in the South, especially in that district, means $50 used in commerce. It is not woven there; it is not consumed in any way there. Every bale of those 260,000 bales is sent out of that country, and I am sorry to say, but yet it is a fact, that every dollar of it is spent for something that is to be consumed in that country. There are $13,000,000 annually raised by the people of that district exported from that district, every dollar of which is spent in supplies consumed by them. They have no factories there, and they never will have any. There is no water-power; there is no coal there. The lands are so rich and the making of a living is so easy that no population living there can ever be induced to engage in the hard and continuous labor necessary for successful manufacturing.

That $13,000,000 is spent in meat; some of it, I am sorry to say, in corn, in clothing, in sugar and molasses, in the ordinary supplies of life; and the money is all spent for American supplies. The population, as I have shown you, is 81,000 colored out of 98,000 altogether. The colored people there do not buy imported fine fabrics, nor do the white people. I will venture to say that there are not $500,000 of the whole $13,000,000 spent every year by that population ever invested in a foreign importation. The things which those people need are the things which are raised in the West and which are manufactured in New England. They buy shoes, hats, calicoes, and the coarser kinds of woolen and cotton goods.

Now, this is the case with only 12 per cent. of the land in cultivation. You have $13,000,000 a year of exports to the other States of this Union, and yet only 12 per cent. of that rich and magnificent country is now in cultivation. I do not go too far when I say that were that 5,000,000 acres of land in Mississippi subject to overflow in a proper state of cultivation the whole cotton crop of the United States as it now exists can be raised on it, and in addition to that the food to sustain the population.

Mr. President, are we going to throw that away? Is the Senate so averse to making an appropriation for a public purpose (only one-sixth of that which is needed for it, the other five-sixths being furnished by that district) because a private benefit may result from it? Are they willing to turn that magnificent country, almost as large as Egypt, back into the jungles? With that overflow the Mississippi River is forty miles wide, houses are washed away, fences are washed away, stock of all sorts are drowned. Sir, I have traveled myself in a boat over splendid plantations capable of producing and actually producing in good years a bale and a half of cotton to the acre, $75 worth of produce per acre, all submerged by this mighty stream. Are we so opposed to helping those people that we can not find it a public duty, a duty we owe to all the people of the United States, to improve the Mississippi River, to wash out its bars, because foorsooth it may help some private individual down there?

What would England or France or Germany give for such an addition to their territory as is here in the Yazoo delta? Egypt has been the subject of contest for years among the great powers of Europe. It is now a matter of consultation and conference among all the crowned heads of Europe as to what to do with it. Yet Egypt is only one-seventh greater, not compared to the whole valley, but to that portion of it which is in the State of Mississippi, and for the insignificant sum of $250,000, all that is needed to do a public work necessary, we turn our backs and say we will not make the appropriation.

If Senators could see this thing as I know it to exist, if they could see the devastation and ruin produced by the floods; and if they could study and know, as their own officers have shown them, that the best way to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River is to make dikes which will protect this property, I think they would act without hesitation in this matter.

Anybody who will study the Mississippi River will find that it is a stream running over alternate ridges and valleys. It does not run down a valley like other rivers; it runs across ridges and valleys. Deep valleys and high ridges constitute the bed of the Mississippi River. All you have to do is to confine the current within the banks of the stream, and the ridges will be eroded and washed away and put into the valleys. Then you will have navigation; you will not have one hundred feet of water at one place and four and five feet at another. That is the theory upon which the Mississippi River Commission proceeds. That is the way they intend to do, and by which they can save the stream.

Some one, the Senator from Delaware, I believe, asked the question what good had been done. Sir, in Plum Point reach and Lake Providence reach, mentioned in the report of the Mississippi River Commission, the channel has already been deepened in one place to twelve feet and in the other to fifteen feet, when the river below and above where these works were in low water is only four and a half and five feet. These points where the works were commenced were the shallowest places. This was accomplished simply by the same principle that we do, or propose to do, in building the levees, making the current stronger, confining the water to the channel of the river, doing exactly as nature intended it should do to carry its own silt and sediment to the Gulf instead of going in eddies and at every eddy place making a deposit.

Mr. President, in view of the magnitude of this interest, in view of the certainty of the beneficial results to follow from it, I beg Senators, not upon the mere recommendation of the committee, without rhyme or reason, to refuse to give to their own commission the means or one-half the means which that commission has said are necessary in order to improve the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 952 of section 1, in the matter proposed to be inserted by the Committee on Commerce, after the word "channel" it is moved to strike out the words, "Provided further, that of said first-mentioned sum the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to," and to insert "for." Also, at the end of the paragraph, insert the words "two hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

So as to make the last part of the amendment of the committee read:

For the protection of the harbor of Memphis, Tenn., and the work already done on the same by the Government, against destruction by the washing and erosion of the east bank of the Mississippi River at that place, $250,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when Mr. JACKSON's name was called). I was paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], but the pair has been transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (when the name of Mr. VOORHEES was called). The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 22, nays 27; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 28th instant, approved and signed the bill (S. 353) to repeal section 1 of the act entitled "An act making a grant of lands in alternate sections to aid in the construction and extension of the Iron Mountain Railroad, from Pilot Knob, in the State of Missouri, to Helena, in Arkansas," approved July 4, 1866, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a letter from Messrs. Shellabarger and Wilson, in which they present a claim of $2,000 for services in defending John G. Thompson, late Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives in an action for false arrest and imprisonment brought against him by Hallett Kilbourn, of Washington, D. C.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the sundry civil appropriation act of August, 1872, information relative to the distribution of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, and recommending the appointment of one or more additional laborers to assist in the work of distribution; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of February 27, 1884, a report upon the second cruise of the revenue-steamer Corwin in the Arctic Ocean; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and others was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 6750) to amend paragraph 7 of section 2527 of the Revised Statutes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S BUREAU.

Mr. MAXEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 838) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments, and that the conferees of the Senate and House agree to the Senate bill with the following amendments: In line 6 strike out the word "two" and insert the word "three;" and in line 8 strike out the word "four" and insert the word "three."

JOHN A. LOGAN,
W. J. SEWELL,
S. B. MAXEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. S. ROSECRANS,
CHARLES H. MORGAN,
B. M. CUTCHEON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. MAXEY. The House conferees receded from the amendments of the House and agreed to the bill as it passed the Senate, with only the change that the number of judge-advocates-general to rank as lieutenant-colonels was increased from two to three, and the number of majors was reduced from four to three. That is the only change. I ask that the report be concurred in.

The report was concurred in.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5442) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico, to report it with amendments favorably to the consideration of the Senate, to be acted upon at the next session, and I am further instructed to file therewith a written report on or before the commencement of the next session of Congress. I ask that the bill go upon the Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In connection with that report I desire to state that I do not assent to the report, and will ask for the privilege of submitting the views of the minority in future, if I shall deem it necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas, from the Committee on Commerce, reports favorably the bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico, and asks permission to file a report at some future day, and the Senator from Minnesota, dissenting therefrom, asks permission to file the views of the minority. If there be no objection such order will be made, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the resolution of the committee that accompanies the bill.

Mr. COKE. The following resolution of the committee I report in accordance with the request of the Senator:

Moved by Senator VEST that the Senator from Texas be instructed to report the bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico favorably for the consideration of the Senate at its next session, to be accompanied by a written report, to be filed by or before the next session.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Amendments were submitted by Mr. BECK, Mr. MAXEY, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. MILLER of New York, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. PENDLETON, and Mr. BROWN, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Joint Committee on the Library, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I now ask that on all subsequent amendments to this bill the five-minute rule be applied to debate. It is a late hour in the day, and I want to get through with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves that in all subsequent amendments to this bill the rule limiting debate to five minutes by each Senator be applied.

The motion was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 991 of section 1, after "Grand Chain," to strike out "and $7,500 for the ice-harbor at the mouth of the Great Kanawha" and insert "and $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the improvement of the navigation of the river at Jeffersonville and the protection of the Government property;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving the Ohio River: Continuing improvement, $600,000; of which sum $70,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the completion of the Davis Island Dam, shall be expended on that work; $50,000 shall be used in continuing work on the upper and lower dikes and other improvements at Grand Chain, and $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the improvement of the navigation of the river at Jeffersonville and the protection of Government property.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, after the word "obstructions," in line 20, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing hereinbefore contained shall be construed as a limitation upon the powers of the board of engineers, hereinbefore designated, to prepare and submit plans, specifications, estimates, and recommendations for the expenditure of the appropriations for the Missouri River; and that said board of engineers shall constitute a commission, to be called the Missouri River Commission, to be selected from the Engineer Corps of the Army, whose duty it shall be to complete the surveys of said Missouri River between its mouth and headwaters, and make such additional surveys and investigations of said river as may be deemed needful for the maturing of such plans and estimates as will permanently locate and deepen the channel and protect the banks of said Missouri River, and give safety to its navigation and promote commerce and the postal service. Said plans, with their estimated cost, shall be by said commission reported to the Secretary of War, who shall submit the same to Congress; and all appropriations hereafter made for said river shall be expended in accordance with the same, or such other plans as said commission shall from time to time report and submit through the Secretary of War to Congress as hereinbefore provided. The Secretary of War shall designate which of said engineers shall be president of said commission, and each shall continue to be a member of said commission upon no other salary than now allowed by law, subject only to removal by the Secretary of War, who shall fill any vacancy that may occur in said commission by like other appointment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 14, after the word "material," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter all purchases of supplies and materials shall be made by contract, after legal advertisement, under such rules and instructions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. VEST. I want to take the sense of the Senate in regard to retaining that proviso with certain modifications. It will be seen that it is a very important provision and I ask the attention of the Senate to it.

The preceding part of this section to that stricken out provides that the Secretary of War, where the work on rivers and harbors is done under contract, shall cause the contracts to be given to the lowest responsible bidder. That is right and it is the proper way for doing work on these improvements. The House of Representative carried out the same principle as to supplies and materials purchased where the work is done by the Government. It is a very important matter, because the supplies amount to thousands of dollars. The officers who now purchase them may buy from their favorites and pay such prices as they choose. I say economical, just, and honest administration ought to require that the same principle should be applied to purchases of supplies and materials as to contracts for work; that is to say, it should be had from the lowest responsible bidder. I propose, therefore, to take the sense of the Senate by modifying the proviso which the committee propose to strike out. It reads now:

Provided, That hereafter all purchases of supplies and materials shall be made by contract, after legal advertisement, under such rules and instructions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

In order to obviate the objection that an officer ought to be permitted to purchase five or ten or twenty dollars' worth of supplies for immediate emergencies, I propose to make it read:

Provided, That hereafter all purchases of supplies and materials amounting to $1,000 or more shall be made by contract after legal advertisement.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I did not hear the Senator's amendment.

Mr. VEST. I propose to modify the House proviso so as to read:

Provided, That hereafter all purchases of supplies and materials amounting to $1,000 or more shall be made by contract after legal advertisement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 15 of section 3, after the word "materials," it is proposed to insert "amounting to $1,000 or more;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That hereafter all purchases of supplies and materials amounting to $1,000 or more shall be made by contract after legal advertisement under such rules and instructions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend by striking out "one thousand" and inserting "five hundred."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A further amendment to the amendment is not in order.

Mr. VEST. I will accept $500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri modifies his amendment. The amendment now is $500.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Missouri will not be adopted. This applies only, it will be observed, to purchases of supplies and materials. The previous part of the section provides for letting the contracts for all work on these public improvements to the lowest bidder under public advertisement and proposals. This proviso applies only to supplies. The Chief of Engineers is of opinion that to insert a proviso of this kind or a proviso such as is moved by the Senator from Missouri would very seriously embarrass him in carrying forward the work on these public improvements, if it would not in many cases prevent him from doing so.

If the proviso were adopted, the Secretary of War or the engineers in charge of these public improvements could not purchase any of the supplies needed for the tugboats and snag-boats on the rivers, particularly in rivers where the improvements covered any great reach, without issuing advertisements for proposals; and in supplying the hands on the boat or in making purchases of supplies of any character, no odds what the emergency might be, the Secretary of War or the engineers could not purchase them without first issuing advertisements for proposals. I send to the desk to be read by the Secretary a letter which I have received upon this subject from Colonel Parke, expressing fully the views of the Chief of Engineers upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1884.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to my interview of this morning in regard to the river and harbor act now under consideration, I have thought it best to send you the following memorandum:

The proviso to section 3, lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, page 36, was not in the bill as reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives. It was offered and accepted by the chairman in Committee of the Whole. (See RECORD of June 13, page 5677.)

Now, if this proviso becomes law, I fear it will tend to embarrass operations, and possibly may in some cases stop all work.

The Revised Statutes and Army Regulations direct how the materials and supplies for the public service shall be procured; and I would respectfully invite attention to sections 3709 and 3710 of the former, and to Army Regulations of 1881, paragraphs 1486, 1487, 1488, and 1489; which you will see carefully guard and protect the interests of the Government.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN G. PARKE.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the Secretary to read the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to in the letter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3709. All purchases and contracts for supplies or services, in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the articles or performance of the service. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract, at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold, or such services engaged, between individuals.

SEC. 3710. Whenever proposals for supplies have been solicited, the parties responding to such solicitation shall be duly notified of the time and place of opening the bids, and be permitted to be present either in person or by attorney, and a record of each bid shall then and there be made.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I also request the Secretary to read the paragraphs in the Army Regulations, and I call the attention of the Senate to the particular restrictions embodied in those regulations.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

1486. When the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of supplies, or the immediate furnishing of transportation or other services, advertisements shall be published for a reasonable time to allow persons at a distance to compete, and a proper time, to be set forth in the advertisement, will be given the successful bidder to make deliveries or to furnish the supplies, transportation, or services after the award.

1487. Formal written contracts, with suitable bonds, will be made in all cases when time and circumstances allow.

1488. When an exigency demands that purchases in open market be made, the purchasing officer will, if time permit, notify the principal dealers in the articles needed who may be within his reach, and will request them to submit written sealed proposals for the sale of the supplies required. This notice may be given by handbills posted in public places, by circular letters addressed to the principal dealers, or by both these means combined.

1489. When time does not permit even this course to be pursued, purchases may be made in the manner which is usual among business men. All written proposals received when purchases are made in open market will be forwarded in the proper manner to the chief of the bureau of the War Department to which the supplies purchased pertain.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Under these regulations in pursuance of the statute, all of which has been read to the Senate, it seems to me that there are sufficient safeguards thrown about this matter to relieve the Secretary of War. There are exigencies arising where it would be impossible for him to issue proposals and public advertisement in the time required without seriously interfering with the work. The officers of the Army are compelled to render a strict account of their purchases, itemized accounts of the purchases made, and they are subject to military discipline, so that in all points of view it seems to me there can be no danger resulting from it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair notifies the Senator from Minnesota that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. VEST. I want to say a word in reply to the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has once addressed the Chair on the amendment; but he has proposed a modification.

Mr. VEST. I just want to say a word in reply to the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator, as the amendment has been modified since he spoke before.

Mr. VEST. The provisions of the statute to which the chairman of the committee has referred and the Army Regulations are the same which have obtained for years, and under which the very greatest abuses have been committed. Every Senator who has taken pains to analyze those sections will see that both the regulations and the statute have this clause in each, "when the public exigencies do not permit." That opens the whole door and leaves it to the discretion of the officer. Any lieutenant, any quartermaster, or captain of a snag-boat has the discretion, and the unlimited discretion, to say when the public exigency requires or not; and under this system what has been the result? If Senators will look in the press this morning, it rings with abuses committed in this very city in all the Departments under this supply-purchase system.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Has the Senator ever heard of any improper conduct in regard to purchases under the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. VEST. I could bring statements here, if time permitted, from merchants in all the principal cities in this Union complaining of favoritism in regard to this thing. Look how simple it is. Here is a man who wants to purchase $5,000 or $10,000 or $20,000 or $30,000 worth of supplies; he simply goes to the most convenient merchant and says to him, "I take these supplies from you at your own price; put in a margin, and then," to use the parlance in the Departments here, for it has passed into a word in the English language, "we will have a divy;" that is to say, they rob the Government and divide the surplus.

I have the greatest respect for General Parke; I do not say he is a party to any such thing; but I say that in view of recent developments in this very city in all the Departments, in the Navy Department, in the Treasury Department, where men who stood as high in the service as General Parke or anybody else have been found to have been engaged in this robbery to the amount of thousands of dollars, it behooves Congress to put every limitation that is possible in regard to the purchase of these supplies and the performance of this work. General Parke's letter goes for nothing under my amendment, because he there takes an extreme case, an officer who wants to buy ten or twenty dollars' worth of supplies for immediate use. Under this amendment, if it is less than $500, he can buy in the ordinary course of business; but when it is over $500 he is required to put it up to the lowest responsible bidder. I say that is the only safe practice and the system which ought to be adopted both in regard to supplies and public works, including public buildings.

Here now our committee-room on Public Buildings and Grounds has a stock of papers which I have been proposing to examine, that it would take me two months probably to get through, containing a record of fraud and outrage on this Government in the Bureau of Public Buildings almost without a parallel—an officer permitted to resign and go out of the service and men implicated in it. He had a ring about him in the capital. As soon as a public building bill was passed the men got it who were here in Washington. Our object was to put the money in the town where the building was to be erected so as to encourage the enterprise of domestic mechanics. Instead of that, four or five men were here around this capital, and as soon as the bill was passed the bargain was made, and the first thing a stranger appeared away off in Nevada or California with his contract in his hand, and the mechanics who were intended to be benefited knew nothing of it until the work was commenced. The whole thing was wrong. I thought this amendment was broad enough, because it says "after legal advertisement under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I trust that the amendment will not prevail. It is perfectly evident, and must be to every Senator, that a very large part of the expenditures under this bill are in such portions of the country and made under such conditions that it is absolutely impossible that contracts could be made for all the supplies that may be used. If this amendment is adopted it simply ties the hands of the Secretary of War and the Engineer Department and turns them over to the mercies of a ring of contractors.

This amendment and this provision here that all work and all materials shall be given to the lowest bidder has been moved from time immemorial. I have repeatedly been sought to introduce it myself and have always refused. I have never found any complaint of the manner of the Government's doing this work except from contractors. They are the only people from whom any complaint has ever come. I do not believe there is any scandal whatever connected with these public works so far as the engineers of the Army are concerned, and certainly it will be quite as safe I believe for us to trust the expenditure of this money to the Secretary of the War and to the Engineer Corps as it will be to turn it over absolutely to men who are engaged in contracting for public works.

It is absolutely impossible that the work can go on successfully in some portions of the country if this provision be enacted into law; and even the main part of this section which the committee have left seems to me should be carried still further and should provide in explicit terms that the Secretary of War may reject any and all bids that are made; otherwise, if he is compelled to accept the lowest bid it is possible for the contractors to form a ring and make their bids precisely as they see fit and thus rob the Government. Such was the history of the Erie Canal contracts in the State of New York; such has been the history of all contract work where the Government has not been protected by giving to its officers the right to reject any and all bids.

But it is proposed to limit the amount of purchases that can be made to the sum of $1,000 or $500. Look at the investigations made in the city of New York this winter. Under the laws of the State all contracts with the city departments above $1,000 were to be let to the lowest bidder. It was discovered that nearly all, everything was divided up into jobs of $999 and given out without any contract. There is no guarantee in such a system. We must trust this matter to the honesty and integrity of the Secretary of War and the engineers in charge of the work. If we can not do that we certainly can not give it into the tender mercies of the contractors who are engaged on our public works. It is much better to leave it as it is, and I trust the chairman will amend section 3 by providing that the Secretary of War shall have power to reject any and all bids which he deems it for the interest of the Government to refuse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce to strike out the proviso to section 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That in case any person or corporation shall knowingly damage, injure, impair, or obstruct the navigation of any of the harbors or rivers herein appropriated for, by the deposit of refuse matter or otherwise, such person or corporation shall immediately remove the same, or, failing to do so, shall be liable in an action by the United States for damages in double the amount expended by the United States for the removal of such obstructions, and that the depositing by any process or in any manner of refuse, dirt, materials, ashes, or cinders, or any other matter of any kind other than that flowing from street sewers and carried therefrom in a liquid state into tidal waters within the navigable waters of the harbor of New York or its adjacent and tributary waters, whereby a deposit shall or may be created and the draught of water lessened, or of any other deleterious substance whereby fishes useful for food are injured or driven away or destroyed, is hereby strictly forbidden, and every such act is hereby made a misdemeanor; and all persons engaged in or who authorize or instigate such an offense shall, upon conviction, be punishable with fine or imprisonment, or both, such fine to be not less than $250 nor more than $2,500, and the imprisonment to be not less than thirty days nor more than one year, either or both united, as the judge before whom conviction is obtained shall decide. That the licenses of any and every captain and engineer of any tugboat which shall engage in towing any scow or boat loaded with any such forbidden matter to any point of deposit or discharge within any forbidden limit shall be deemed a party participant in the infringement of this act, and shall, upon conviction, be punishable as hereinbefore provided, and shall also have each his license revoked or suspended for a term commensurate with the offense, to be fixed by the judge before whom tried and convicted. That in all cases of receiving on board of any scow or boat such forbidden matter or substances as herein described, it shall be the duty of the owner or master of such scow or boat to apply for and obtain from the local superintendent of the harbor appointed hereunder a permit defining the precise limits within which the proposed discharge of such scow or boat may be made; and any deviation from such dumping or discharging place specified in such permit shall be a misdemeanor within the meaning of this act; and the master and engineer of any towboat towing such scow or boat shall be equally guilty of such offense with the master of the scow and liable to equal punishment. That the President of the United States shall designate and appoint from the Corps of Engineers of the United States a suitable and efficient officer, who shall be known as superintendent of the harbor of New York, whose duty it shall be to grant permits designating the different localities most convenient within which alone it shall be permissible to discharge and deposit the forbidden matter herein designated. It shall also be his duty to establish a patrol to prevent and detect transgressions of this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. 4. That if any person shall knowingly and willfully damage or injure any public work constructed, or in course of construction, by or under the authority or direction of the United States, for the improvement of any river or harbor, or shall knowingly and willfully impair or obstruct the navigation of any river or harbor for the improvement of which an appropriation is made by this act, or shall knowingly and willfully, by any process or in any manner, deposit, or cause to be deposited, or authorize, instigate, or aid in depositing any refuse, dirt, materials, ashes, cinders, or any substance other than that flowing from street sewers and carried therefrom in a liquid state, into tidal waters within the navigable waters of the harbor of New York, or its adjacent and tributary waters, whereby a deposit shall or may be created and the depth of water lessened, such person, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment of not more than one year, or by fine not more than $2,500, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

No ballast, refuse, dirt, materials, ashes, or cinders, or other substance shall be dumped or discharged into the waters of the harbor of New York, or its adjacent or tributary waters, unless a permit shall be first obtained for that purpose from the local superintendent of the harbor to be appointed as hereinafter provided, defining the precise limits within which the proposed dumping or discharge shall be made; and the master of any scow or other vessel from which any such ballast or refuse matter shall be discharged without such permit or without the limits defined in such permit, and the master or engineer of any towboat, which shall tow any such scow or vessel for the purpose of dumping or depositing any such ballast or refuse matter without such permit, or without the limits specified therein, shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this section, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by fine or imprisonment as hereinbefore provided, and shall also, in the discretion of the court, have each his license revoked or suspended for a term commensurate with the offense, to be fixed by the judge before whom tried and convicted. And any person or corporation placing, or causing to be placed or deposited, any refuse matter, or other obstructions to the navigation of any of the harbors or rivers for the improvement of which appropriation is made in this act, shall be liable to the United States in an action brought by the United States in double the amount which shall have been expended by the United States for the removal of such obstructions, together with the costs and disbursements of the action.

The President of the United States shall designate and appoint three experienced officers of the General Government, who shall constitute a board of superintendence of New York Harbor. The three members shall be selected as follows: One shall be an officer of Army engineers, one an officer of the Navy, and one an officer of the Coast Survey. The board of superintendence shall have a permanent organization, and the President of the United States shall appoint other members from the same branches of the public service whensoever those holding office on the board shall be from any cause detached. The board shall constantly consider the best means of preventing deposits in the harbor of New York and the waters adjacent thereto and of regulating such deposits, and shall issue the orders necessary for these objects.

The President of the United States shall designate and appoint a suitable officer of the Army or Navy who shall carry out and enforce the orders and decrees of the board of superintendence, and who shall be the superintendent herein named. This officer shall have personal charge and supervision under the said board, and shall direct the patrol-boats and other means used to detect and bring to punishment offenders against port rules; and the said board shall make an examination and survey of the harbor of New York, and make a report thereof to the Secretary of War, to be submitted to Congress at the next session; and the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of this section.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Before the question is put I desire to move an amendment to the amendment. In line 43, after the word "shall," I move to insert the words "besides the penalties hereinbefore provided."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 43, after the word "shall," it is proposed to insert "besides the penalties hereinbefore provided;" so as to read:

And any person or corporation placing, or causing to be placed or deposited, any refuse matter, or other obstructions to the navigation of any of the harbors or rivers for the improvement of which appropriation is made in this act, shall, besides the penalties hereinbefore provided, be liable to the United States in an action, &c.

Mr. DOLPH. I suggest to the Senator from New York that he put instead of that language the words "shall, besides being liable to the punishment hereinbefore provided," so that there shall be no claim that the penalty is to be recovered in the action.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I have no objection to adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon. I want the lawyers of the body to make the language perfectly plain. The amendment I submitted was drawn by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. I think the words are sufficient as I have proposed them.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not see what proper place a provision of this kind has on a river and harbor bill. The definition of the criminal jurisdiction of the United States, it occurs to me, ought to be left to the Judiciary Committee. This amendment of the Committee on Commerce proposes to increase the criminal jurisdiction of the courts of the United States beyond the boundary now fixed, as I understand. That is what is attempted.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I think not. It has been customary in these bills heretofore to provide for the punishment of any person who willfully or otherwise destroys the public works of the United States, or obstructs in any way the navigation of any of the waters, or damages any of the works being erected under the authority of the river and harbor bill. That is in nearly all the bills. This probably goes a little further.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Why the necessity for it in this?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The necessity in this case is very apparent. The State of New York has attempted to protect the harbor of New York, and has found it impossible to do it because of the conflict of authority between the States of New York and New Jersey in regard to the waters, and also from the fact that the waters really are subject to the authority of the United States Government and not to the government either of New York or New Jersey. It has found it impossible properly to protect the harbor of New York. For a long time we have been attempting to devise some legislation which would enable the United States Government to properly guard and protect that great harbor. This is the result of much labor in that direction. It is certainly impossible, as the Senator knows, to pass it in any other way than on the river and harbor bill. It is in the direct line of legislation we have frequently added on this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is a very remarkable provision, because the laws of the United States on this subject ought to be uniform, and I can not conceive of any reason why the port of New York should be singled out more than other ports similarly situated. The question of jurisdiction arises here. While the rivers and harbors of the United States may be improved by the money power of the Government, I can not think that the power to make individual acts criminal under the authority of the United States follows from that. The power to regulate commerce confers upon this Government no power to create crimes. The harbors of the United States are for all criminal purposes within the jurisdiction of the respective States. In my State they have enacted laws on this subject providing against this very thing, making it criminal in any shipmaster to dump ballast into the bays and harbors of that State. Now, I say the jurisdiction must be either in the one authority or in the other. It can not be in both. It will lead to conflict of jurisdiction between the States and the General Government.

Does it follow because an appropriation is made for the improvement of a river in the interior of a State to facilitate commerce that the right to make an individual act on that river criminal follows from any provision in our organic law? Acts that we are authorized to designate as criminal are limited under our system. With respect to the District of Columbia and forts and arsenals of course we could do anything, because we have there the power of general legislation; but when you leave those jurisdictions you are restricted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair notifies the Senator from Florida that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair notifies the Senator from New York that he has once addressed the Senate on this amendment, and under the rule he has no right to do so again without unanimous consent.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to substitute for the words of the Senator from New York the words which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon is not in order, the pending amendment being an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Let the words be reported and perhaps I may accept them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words proposed will be read, if there be no objection.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted, substitute:

Besides being subject to punishment as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is just as well.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York modifies his amendment according to the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point of order that this is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On which amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. The one under consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean the committee amendment or this phraseological amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. The committee amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The amendment is simply changing the language that is already in the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator I will state that section 4 in the bill is substantially section 4 as it appears in the amendment of the Senate Committee on Commerce. We merely undertook to put section 4 of the House bill in a form that we thought was better.

Mr. MORGAN. It is none the less general legislation on an appropriation bill. The House takes the liberty, of course, of amending the laws in a general way on appropriation bills, and the Senate rules leave us only the opportunity of voting for or against such measures as we see proper. We can not amend them under the ruling frequently made by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Alabama as raising the question of order upon that part of the amendment recommended by the committee to be inserted.

Mr. MORGAN. As section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the amendment is legislation, and is not in order as an amendment to this bill, and so rules.

Mr. FRYE. The Chair understands that it is an amendment to a House provision contained in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that distinctly; but it makes no difference in the opinion of the Chair. That part of the amendment proposed to be inserted the Chair regards as legislation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not understand that the river and harbor bill is embraced within the term "general appropriation bill" as it is understood in the application of this rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair may be in error; but the Chair does not quite agree with the Senator from Minnesota. The Chair regards it as a general appropriation bill and subject to all the rules applicable to general appropriation bills.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think it has never been so considered heretofore.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Certainly if the committee had not disturbed the legislation put in by the House there would have been no possibility of striking it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that that is a question which has been raised very often. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate upon the appeal of the Senator from New York?

Mr. CONGER. Almost every paragraph in this bill is new legislation.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. There is not anything else in the bill.

Mr. CONGER. We should have to cut out almost the entire bill if this ruling were sustained. This has never been considered by the committee a general appropriation bill subject to the rule as to new legislation, as I understand. It is not merely to appropriate for things already provided for by law, but to make the law itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If this be a general appropriation bill, as the Chair thinks it is, and the matter proposed by the Committee on Commerce to be inserted in it be general legislation, as the Chair thinks it is, then it is clearly out of order, and the Chair so rules and rules it upon the ground just stated. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. INGALLS. Upon what point, whether this is a general appropriation bill, or whether this is general legislation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks both points are included.

Mr. INGALLS. The Chair is clearly right about this being a general appropriation bill. Rule XVI provides:

All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The exception in Rule XVI raises unmistakably by implication and by direct inference the declaration that this is a general appropriation bill. There can be, I think, no reasonable question upon that point; and if that be true then there can be no further dispute. I think that the Chair is right in holding that this is general legislation and therefore can not be received upon this bill. I shall therefore be compelled to vote to sustain the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I desire to appeal to the Senator from Alabama to withdraw his point of order. He will see on looking at this bill that section 4 as passed by the House is in many respects imperfect. It is now in the bill, and of course will remain there; and the section as perfected by the Senate committee will be ruled out upon a point of order if the Senate sustains the Chair, and the objectionable section, imperfect as it is, will remain in the bill. Certainly it has always been customary to put legislation of this kind into these bills, and the Senate Committee on Commerce, with great care, have perfected this section. If there are any inaccuracies in the section, and the Senator will point them out, I will ask to have them corrected. I will attempt to have it put in proper shape if there is anything in it which meets with his objection on good grounds. If the point is maintained, it leaves the imperfect provisions of the House in the bill, and the House provides machinery which is entirely inadequate for the work to be done.

I appeal to the Senator from Alabama to withdraw his point of order and let us perfect the section coming from the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. The right way of treating a matter of this kind when brought in from the House is to vote it down. We either have to do that or we have to submit all the time to the House prescribing such general legislation upon appropriation bills as they choose. We can not amend it here under our rules. This point has been made on every bill that has come up during this session of the Senate. Every appropriation bill that has contained general legislation we have uniformly ruled out of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question? I want a little light on this subject. If the rule that is ordinarily applied to an appropriation bill, is applied to this bill, might it not be efficient to use this point of order against an appropriation ordering for instance the construction of a canal at a certain place? Should not the law requiring it contain an appropriation for its construction? Would not that be general legislation on this bill? And if that rule was applied would it not destroy the whole purpose of a river and harbor bill?

Mr. KENNA. Or the improvement of a river not before appropriated for?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Allow me to call the Senator's attention to the bill on page 33. There the Senate have already put in three pages of amendments creating in the most elaborate form a commission for the Missouri River, which from this time forward is to take entire charge of the improvements on the Missouri River, and all moneys appropriated to the Missouri River are hereafter to be expended under the direction of this commission. That is an elaborate law, as much so as the creation of the Mississippi River Commission. That might have been objected to on a point of order if we are to stand on the rules.

I am appealing to the Senator to withdraw the point of order and attempting to show the necessity of doing so; otherwise this bill may be entirely destroyed because the point of order may be made on the Missouri Commission when we come to it in the Senate. Certainly it can be if a separate vote is had in the Senate, and the point is made. There is much general legislation in this bill; in fact, if the general legislation was taken out of it on points of order it would become absolutely worthless, the Department could not go on and perform this work intelligently or thoroughly. If the Senator will look at page 33, for nearly three pages there he will find an elaborate law establishing the Missouri River Commission, and that was not objected to. Now when we come to the harbor of New York, it is thrown out on a point of order. I hope the Senator will withdraw the point.

Mr. MORGAN. It is the duty of the Chair not to receive an amendment that is not in order on this bill, and I have merely suggested it to the Chair that that duty may be performed. If the States of New York and New Jersey had sent down a request to the Congress of the United States to do the legislation for them that they are perfectly competent to do for themselves, I should not have insisted upon the point of order; but I believe we are transgressing a jurisdiction that we ought not to invade when we are passing this amendment, and I think the House did the same thing when it sent up the section here.

I do not care to go back through this bill and ascertain how many points in it have violated the rules of the Senate. It is not for me to do so; but I think it is a plain answer to the question about the commission for the Missouri River to say that that is a mere regulation of the expenditure of the money we appropriate here. We are not appropriating in this section for the purpose of cleaning out the harbor of New York in the manner provided for in this new amendment; we are merely making prohibitory criminal legislation against certain acts to be done there, and conferring new jurisdiction on the courts of the United States in reference to that particular harbor, which I think is improper to be done in an appropriation bill. I should vote against it if it was put on a separate bill. I will never concede that the Government of the United States has the right to take any such jurisdiction in one of the harbors of our States. I therefore insist on my point of order.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If the Senator will look at the close of the amendment of the committee he will find that it appropriates money for the purposes of the section, and also for a survey of the harbor, and it is certainly customary to put surveys in this bill. This section contains an appropriation of $30,000 for carrying on the work and having new surveys. It provides for the protection of the harbor of New York and making new surveys. It is very important that it should be enacted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?" on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. KENNA. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The amendment of the committee consisted of two parts, the striking out of section 4 in the bill as it came from the House, and the insertion of new matter, which has been ruled out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 4 stands on the recommendation of the committee that it be stricken out. That is the condition of the question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The question now before the Senate is on concurring in the recommendation of the committee to strike out section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce to strike out section 4 of the House bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senate will strike out the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. It is quite obvious that we shall not be able to get through with this bill to-night, and if it be agreeable to the Senator from Minnesota I shall move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think if the Senate will remain in session a short time we can get through with the committee amendments to the bill anyhow. We are through with the appropriations proper, and the next section refers merely to the surveys. I presume there will be no objection raised to them.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Committee on Appropriations have nothing for the Senate to-morrow, and we shall have the day for this bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, to strike out section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That such parts of the money appropriated by this or any previous or subsequent act for any particular improvement, whether requiring locks, dams, abutments, or other structures as may be necessary in the prosecution of such improvement, may be expended in the purchase, voluntary or by condemnation, as the case may be, of necessary sites: Provided, That such expenditure shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That if the owners of such lands shall refuse to sell them at reasonable prices, then the prices to be paid shall be determined and the title and jurisdiction procured in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State in which such lands or sites are situated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 8, in the following words:

SEC. 8. That the provisions of section 3692 of the United States Revised Statutes, regarding the proceeds of the sale of public property, shall apply to the sale of any public property pertaining to river and harbor improvements.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 9, in the following words:

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to prescribe such rules and regulations in respect to the use and administration of the public works of the United States under his control relating to the navigation of the rivers, harbors, and canals as in his judgment the public interest may require; which rules and regulations shall be posted in some conspicuous place for the information of the public. Any person violating such rules and regulations shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, to be enforced in any district court of the United States within whose territorial jurisdiction such offense may have been committed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 10, in the following words:

SEC. 10. That any person, unless duly authorized by the Secretary of War, who shall make or assist in making a cut-off at any neck or bend in any river or harbor of the United States, or who shall maliciously injure any of the public works appropriated for in this act, or interfere with the construction thereof, or who shall dump or deposit ashes or cinders, or other refuse matter tending to obstruct navigation, from any vessel, into any portion of Providence River above Nayatt Point, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be tried for such offense before the district court of the United States for the district wherein such offense may be committed; and, if found guilty, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000, or to imprisonment for not more than two years, or both fine and imprisonment as aforesaid, for each offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 11, in the following words:

SEC. 11. That any bridge or other structure that may hereafter be erected over or in any river or harbor of the United States for which appropriation has herein been made shall be subject, for the security and convenience of navigation, to such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure this object the party desiring to construct such bridge or structure shall submit to the Secretary of War drawings and descriptions of the proposed work, which must be approved by the Secretary of War before any such bridge or structure can be constructed. Should any bridge or other structure erected under this authority be found to obstruct the free and convenient navigation of said river or harbor it shall be subject to modification or removal, by direction of the Secretary of War, at the expense of the owners thereof, and to the revocation of such authority by act of Congress, if the public good shall so require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 7:

SEC. 7. That whenever the Secretary of War shall have good reason to believe that any railroad or other bridge now or hereafter to be constructed over any of the navigable waters of the United States, under authority of the United States or of any State or Territory, is an obstruction to the free navigation of such waters, by reason of difficulty in passing the draw-opening or the raft-span of said bridge, by rafts, steamboats, or other water craft, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary, on satisfactory proof thereof, to require the company or persons owning, controlling, or operating said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said draw-opening or of said raft-span, or of both said draw-opening and raft-span, to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for the guiding of said rafts, steamboats, and other water craft safely through said opening or span, or both said opening or span, as shall be specified in his order in that behalf; and on failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time, said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States, and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in any circuit or district court of the United States in which such bridge, or any part thereof, is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof; and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That no greater sum than $15,000 shall be required to be expended upon any one bridge in a single year: Provided further, That such sum of money as may be necessary to execute the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on the requisition of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [12] 8, providing for "examination or surveys or both," under the head of "California," after line 18, to insert:

Napa River, from the mouth thereof to Napa City.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment under the head of "Florida," in line 29 of section [12] 8, after the word "outer" to insert "and inner;" so as to read:

Outer and inner bar at the entrance of Pensacola Harbor; Anclote Harbor; Clearwater Harbor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 31 of section [12] 8, under the head of "Florida," to insert:

Saint Augustine Harbor.
Musquito Inlet.
Amelia and Wacissa Rivers.
Hermosassa Bay.
Jupiter Inlet, on the Atlantic coast.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 44 of section [12] 8.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to offer an amendment to come in after the word "river," in line 44:

Also to make survey of proposed ship-canal from Calumet River to Lake Calumet.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suppose that will be in order after the committee amendments are concluded. There will be no objection to it then.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It may as well go in now.

Several SENATORS. Let it go in now.

Mr. LOGAN. I have been watching for some time for an opportunity to offer it. There can not be any objection to it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I make no objection to it. If the Senator wants it inserted now I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. LOGAN. I understand there is no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be entertained now if there be no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the following item in line 51 of section [12] 8:

Shawneetown Harbor and devee.

Mr. CONGER. In line 51 the word "devee" should be "levee."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, under the head of "Kentucky," in line 77 of section [12] 8, after the word "rivers," to insert "and the Cumberland River above the mouth of the Jellico;" so as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to Congress at its next session, or sooner if practicable, the condition of Green and Barren Rivers, and the Cumberland River above the mouth of the Jellico, in Kentucky, and the provisions and estimate of cost necessary to relieve the same from incumbrance, with a view to such legislation as will render the same free to commerce at the earliest practicable period.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Maine," in line 93 of section [12] 8, after "Saco," to strike out "Harbor" and insert "River;" so as to read:

Saco River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 95 of section [12] 8, before the word "Island," to strike out "Wood's" and insert "Wood;" so as to read:

Wood Island Harbor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 99 of section [12] 8, under the head of "Maryland," to insert:

Harbor at Easton Point, commencing at a point on Third Haven River where the Government work on the channel of said river was recently suspended.
Pocomoke River and Sound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Michigan," after line 116 of section [12] 8, to insert:

The State of Michigan having tendered to the United States the balance of tolls received by the State before the surrender of the Saint Mary's Falls Ship-Canal, to aid in constructing a dry-dock at the canal, such balance being about $60,000, the Secretary of War is directed to cause plans, estimates, and specifications for such dry-dock, above the locks, and also to report whether the old locks can be used for a dry-dock, and the cost of fitting the same for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 132 of section [12] 8, to insert:

Saint Clair River: Examination and survey of the right bank from Lake Huron to Lake Saint Clair, to ascertain whether the erosion and wearing away of said bank is injuring the navigation of Saint Clair River and Saint Clair Flats Canal by shoaling the channel and obstructing navigation therein, and to report estimates of expense for preventing such injury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 139 of section [12] 8, to insert:

For a further and more complete survey for a breakwater at or near Cross Village, in Michigan, in the west part of the Straits of Mackinaw, with a view of making a harbor of refuge at Cross Village, Mich.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Minnesota," after line 145 of section [12] 8, to insert:

Minnesota, and Minnesota and Wisconsin, Saint Louis Bay, and Saint Louis River, from Connor's Point, Wisconsin, and Rice's Point, Minnesota, to foot of first falls, Big Stone Lake, and Lake Traverse, with a view to connecting them.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There are two items there. Let a period be inserted after the word "falls," in line 148, in place of the comma and the initial letter of that word be a capital.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The correction will be made.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then the rest of the amendment beginning "Big Stone Lake" should be a separate item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made. The question is on the amendment of the committee as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, under the head of "Mississippi," after line 158 of section [12] 8, to insert:

Cassidy's Bayou.
Yazoo Pass, to determine the cost of a lock at that place.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under "Missouri," after line 163 of section [12] 8, to insert:

Nish-na-botna River, with a view to increasing the depth of channel in the Missouri River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under "New Hampshire," in line 167 of section [12] 8, after the word "wharf," to strike out "including Little Harbor;" so as to read:

Harbor at Portsmouth, from the sea to the wharf.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 168 of section [12] 8, to insert:

Little Harbor at Portsmouth, with a view to its improvement as a harbor of refuge.
Winnipiseogee Lake, at a point called "The Weirs."

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire how it is possible that Lake Winnipiseogee can be a national work?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is certainly quite unable to inform the Senator. Does the Senator rise to a point of order on this amendment?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and continued to the end of line 176.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask to correct a clerical error: "Carsons," in line 176, should be "Corson;" so as to read:

Corson Sound and Townsend Inlet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 209 of section [12] 8, to insert:

OREGON.

Bar at the mouth of the entrance to Nehalim Bay and River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 212 of section [12] 8, to insert:

PENNSYLVANIA.

West Branch of the Susquehanna River, between Salt Lick and Buttermilk Falls.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 248 of section [12] 8, to insert:

WISCONSIN.

Ashland Harbor, in Ashland Bay, Lake Superior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "Washington Territory," after line 259, of section [12] 8, to insert:

Lewis River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HOAR. I was unable to go before the committee within the last few days before they reported this bill, and I have two or three slight amendments which the committee have escaped. I have seen all the members of the committee, I believe, but one. The first amendment is in section 1, line 333, to strike out "sixteen thousand" and insert "twenty-six thousand five hundred." The Taunton River is a narrow channel, and the whole work has been done except at one point; $26,500 will complete the work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I move also, in line 332, to strike out "continuing" and insert "completing."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the whole amendment in that form.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. In section 1, line 39, I move to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Wareham, Mass.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Then, in section 1, line 27, I move to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Nantucket, Mass.: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNA. On page 18, after line 430 of section 1, I move to insert——

Mr. HARRISON. If we have got through with the committee amendments I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the Senator will allow this amendment to be offered.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the understanding with the chairman was that we should go through with the committee amendments to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the amendments submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts came from the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. They did not, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia offers an amendment which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 430 of section 1 it is proposed to insert:

For continuing the improvement of Little Kanawha River, West Virginia, the sum of $31,000 appropriated by the act of August 2, 1882, is made available.

Mr. KENNA. I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator state the amendment?

Mr. KENNA. The amendment makes available the sum of $31,000, appropriated by the act of 1882 for the completion of the Little Kanawha River improvement. There was a condition attached to the appropriation in the House which was stricken out in the Senate. In conference the condition was restored. The money is appropriated but not available, because of the condition.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That was in the former bill.

Mr. KENNA. In the former bill. This makes no addition to the appropriation, and I hope the committee will make no objection to it.

Mr. RANSOM. It is simply asking the Senate to do what it did two years ago.

Mr. KENNA. Assuming that the Senate take the same position in regard to it that it took before.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment remain until to-morrow morning and be the pending question.

Mr. KENNA. I have no disposition to press it unduly; but it being before the Senate I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator proposes to make an addition to that amendment which has not been read.

Mr. KENNA. There is nothing in the amendment except simply a provision that the amount heretofore appropriated shall be available.

Mr. CONGER. But the addition.

Mr. KENNA. The condition is in the law now, and unless the amendment be adopted without the condition the money will not be available to complete the work. I say to the Senate that the sum of $79,000 has heretofore been appropriated, made available, and expended in the prosecution of this work. That amount is entirely wasted unless the sum necessary to complete the work be made available. This amendment has the effect of making that sum available which has been heretofore appropriated.

Mr. HARRISON. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had not heard the motion.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a right to take toll over a part of the work?

Mr. KENNA. There is no control by anybody over that part of the river for which the appropriation was made.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was not aware that the Senator from Indiana had made a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. I think, as the committee do not quite understand this, it had better go over and be considered in the morning.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the Senator will allow this matter to be disposed of.

Mr. HARRISON. Evidently it is not understood just what the condition is. The Senator will have no trouble with his amendment in the morning. I move that the Senate adjourn.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion to adjourn the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 30, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

BUREAU OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 28, 1884.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, calling attention to certain omissions, &c., in the act (House bill 1340) entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Labor," and invite the attention of the Congress to the same.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

MEMORIAL OF NEW YORK MARINE UNDERWRITERS.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting memorial of George W. Brown, special agent of the marine underwriters of New York, with accompanying petitions, for the amendment of sections 5365 and 5366 of the Revised Statutes, restricting the application of the death penalty to certain cases; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. POLAND, until Tuesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. WORTHINGTON, for one week.

To Mr. BLAND, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. SHAW, indefinitely.

ROSA VERTNER JEFFREY.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I believe the House will bear me out in the assertion that in ten years' service here I have not often asked its indulgence. I now desire to ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2185) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and put the same upon its passage. I want to state that I make this request by the unanimous authority of the Committee on War Claims, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] being the subcommittee having the bill in charge. It is a short bill, and I ask that it be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of Rosa Vertner Jeffrey and the legatees of Claude M. Johnson for the proceeds of value of eight hundred and twenty bales of cotton alleged to have been appropriated by and to the use of the United States be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the same; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said court that the said cotton, or any part thereof, was actually and lawfully seized and removed by the authorized agents of the United States, and not restored, nor the proceeds thereof paid to the owners, the court shall enter judgment for the reasonable value of said cotton, not exceeding the net proceeds of cotton taken at or about the same time in the same locality: Provided, That it shall also appear to the said court that the owners of the said cotton were in fact loyal to the Government of the United States during the late war.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the amendment proposed by the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 11 and 12 the words "and not restored, nor the proceeds thereof paid to the owners," and insert "and the proceeds thereof received by the authorized agents of the United States." Also, after the word "locality," in the sixteenth line, insert "which judgment shall be payable from the net proceeds actually in the Treasury of cotton received by Treasury agents at Vicksburg against which no valid claims exist."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I see no objection to the reference to the Court of Claims under the Bowman bill. But the object here seems to be quite different from the mere reference under the general law. I do not understand from the reading of the bill the motive for this form of reference, and should like to hear an explanation from the gentleman in charge of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state—and it will take but a moment—if the gentleman from Indiana and the House will notice, the committee has put a proviso in the shape of a limitation upon the bill that seems to my mind to go even further than the general bill to which the gentleman has referred, because it is expressly stated on the part of the committee reporting this measure that if the Court of Claims find anything due it shall only be paid out of the net proceeds of cotton received at that one point against which no valid claims exist against the Treasury Department. It will be seen then that this bill is restricted in its effect so far as the fund applicable to its payment is concerned. The committee as a whole agreed to this, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], being the subcommittee in charge, in order to make provision for a definite settlement and a specific payment of the claim, not from any general fund but only from the net proceeds arising from the cotton in this one particular locality against which there exists no claim at present in the Treasury Department, proposes the amendment which fixes the limitation. I think the House will see that this is an express limitation, which does not apply under the general law. But the committee as a whole reported this, and of course I shall be content with it in its present form.

Mr. HOLMAN. The difference is that the judgment in this case seems to be made special, and would follow the cotton wherever it had gone; yet under the Bowman bill the finding of the court is to be simply certified back to Congress for an appropriation. I did not hear the first portion of the bill read, and ask that the bill and amendments be again reported.

The bill and amendments were again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. In this case now it is evident that the judgment, whatever it may be, is to be paid out of the proceeds of cotton received at a certain place. Under that language it would seem that the judgment if not satisfied by the cotton found at that point would be good against any other cotton held by the Government received at any other point. Suppose there is not enough cotton at that point to meet the judgment. Would it not stand as a judgment unsatisfied against the Government?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not so understand it. My information from the Treasury Department is that there were but five hundred bales of cotton received by the Treasury agents at that point; against that how much of valid claims exist I do not know; but the residue of it, if any, is to be applied solely to the settlement of this judgment. I do not understand that there will be any judgment remaining against the Government for the unpaid portion of the claim if this is not adequate. I do not think the bill itself would support that construction. Certainly that is not the understanding.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the bill itself give an improper advantage to this claimant over the other claims for cotton seized at some other place? It is impossible, of course, to trace the cotton which may have been seized at that point and shipped to other points where it was sold. Now it would seem, under the circumstances, that this would give undue advantages to this claimant in that respect, and that the residue of the unpaid claim arising from the cotton on hand from that point and actually received by the Treasury would follow as a judgment against the United States.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to stand committed on the records of this Congress upon this construction: that the residue unpaid, if any, after the judgment of the Court of Claims has been rendered, will not be construed as a judgment against the Government at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the bill comes from the Committee on Ways and Means, as I understood unanimously, with that condition, I shall not make objection to it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It comes from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to have a statement of the chairman of the committee, who I see is present.

Mr. GEDDES. I can add but little to what has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky. This amendment suggested by him was submitted to me and to other members of the committee, and I believe was generally satisfactory. It was supposed that it would be paid out of this specific fund and none other; but if that fund prove insufficient, in my judgment there would be no remaining claim against the United States for any unpaid portion. If it is liable to any other construction it would not have met my approval, nor do I believe it would have met the approval of the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am perfectly willing——

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Ohio thinks the bill with that limitation is a proper one——

Mr. GEDDES. It made that impression on my mind. I am still satisfied with it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to consume the time of the House, and if that provision be incorporated upon the bill I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The committee propose an amendment by striking out the following words: "and not restored nor the proceeds thereof paid to the owners," and in lieu thereof inserting "and the proceeds thereof received by the authorized agents of the United States."

The bill as sent to the desk by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] strikes out the words which the committee have proposed to insert.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want it with the limitation that the committee have put in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Then this is a mistake.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. STORM. I am a member of the Committee on War Claims, and I wish to say in my own behalf that I have no recollection that that amendment was ever submitted to me. I do not want therefore to go on the record as having indorsed any violation of the principle underlying the Bowman bill, that the judgment of the Court of Claims must always come back to the committee for action and the money must be appropriated by Congress to pay that judgment. I have no objection in this case, if it is so provided in the bill, that if the specific fund out of which the judgment is to be paid is not sufficient there shall be no lien against the Government.

Mr. BLACKBURN. To that I am perfectly willing to agree.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman's amendment as soon as the pending amendment of the committee before the House is disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. Let there also be an amendment providing that it shall come under the provisions of the Bowman bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Committee on War Claims are willing the bill should pass with this special limitation. I am willing to accept the suggestion which has been made on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that it shall be further amended so there shall be no judgment against the Government because of any deficit in this special fund.

Mr. RANDALL. But that does not bring it under the principles of the Bowman bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the committee will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert before the word "provided" the following:
"Which judgment shall be payable from the net proceeds actually in the Treasury of cotton received by the Treasury agents at Vicksburg against which no valid claim exists."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STORM. I now move to insert at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, The sum paid out of said specific fund shall be in full satisfaction of said judgment.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. 7225) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which concurrence was requested.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the message just received from the Senate.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. 7235) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. There are two hundred and twenty-odd amendments to that bill inserted by the action of the Senate. I have the consent of a majority of the Committee on Appropriations to ask the Senate amendments be printed and numbered, and further to move non-concurrence in those Senate amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How much do they add to the total of the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. Over $1,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL's motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. For the purpose of shortening the controversy between the two Houses I ask the usual course be departed from, and that a committee of conference be requested on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. That is entirely regular and parliamentary, and if there be no objection it will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House, Mr. RANDALL, Mr. BURNES, and Mr. CANNON in the absence of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS].

Some time subsequently,

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CALKINS in the place of Mr. CANNON, declined, as one of the conferees on the part of the House.

AMERICAN-SPANISH COMMISSION.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, that committee was discharged from the further consideration of the message from the President of the United States transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State recommending an appropriation for the various umpires in the late American-Spanish Commission; and the same was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

TOBACCO DESTROYED BY FLOOD IN OHIO RIVER.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, by unanimous consent, that committee was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5855) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the value of revenue stamps affixed to manufactured tobacco destroyed by reason of flood in the Ohio River, and making an apppropriation to pay the holders thereof; and the same was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

OZETTE INDIANS.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, by unanimous consent, that committee was discharged from the further consideration of the message from the President of the United States transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State recommending an appropriation for rewarding the services of the Ozette Indians in rescuing and caring for the crew of the American steamer Umatilla; and the same was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ABANDONED AND USELESS MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

On motion of Mr. MAGINNIS, by unanimous consent, the House took from the Speaker's table a message from the Senate asking for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move the request of the Senate be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. ROSECRANS, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. STEELE.

PORTS OF DELIVERY.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to report at this time from the Committee on Ways and Means for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6750) with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6750) to amend paragraph 7 of section 2527 of the Revised Statutes.

Be it enacted, &c., That paragraph 7 of section 2527 of the Revised Statutes be, and hereby is, amended by adding after the word "Provincetown" the word "Dennis."

The following amendments were recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means:

In line 5 change "word" to "words."
In line 6, after the word "Dennis," add the word "Bourne."

Mr. WELLER. I would like the gentleman from New York to state the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is impossible to understand the effect of this unless the section of the Revised Statutes be read.

Mr. HISCOCK. The bill with the amendment of the committee simply makes two other ports of delivery in a collection district. It involves no expense to anybody. It does not increase the expense at all. The matter was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and they report it favorably.

Mr. RANDALL. We have just passed a law, so far as the action of the House is concerned, to reduce the number of collection districts.

Mr. HISCOCK. It does not affect the collection districts at all.

Mr. RANDALL. Are they ports of delivery or ports of entry?

Mr. HISCOCK. Ports of delivery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That all appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws which shall remain unprovided for on the 30th day of June, 1884, be, and they are hereby, continued and made available for a period of five days from and after that date, unless the regular appropriations therefor provided for in bills now pending in Congress shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885; and in case the appropriations or any of them hereby continued are or is insufficient to carry on the said necessary operations, a sufficient amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to carry on the same: Provided, That no greater amount shall be expended therefor than will be in the same proportion to the appropriations of the fiscal year 1884 as five days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year: Provided further, That authority is also granted for continuing during the same period the necessary work required for public printing and binding, and for all other miscellaneous objects made in the sundry civil and naval appropriation acts in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made for said objects: And provided further, That all sums expended under this act shall be charged to and deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

Mr. RANDALL. That resolution is of like character and substance and almost identical in language, except that it is made applicable to the present time, with the resolution under like circumstances heretofore adopted and made law. The object is to continue lawfully for five days after the close of the current fiscal year the governmental expenses under the existing appropriation acts. It meets with the approval of every member of the Committee on Appropriations who has been consulted save one, whom I have not been able to reach this morning. It takes the place generally of a bill from the Senate which related to permitting the public printing to go on, and includes every department of the Government, so that no friction may be occasioned in the administration of our affairs and no lack of money to execute the laws.

I ask the adoption of the resolution.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On amendments 8, 9, 10, and 11, which strike out the provision that abolishes the office of Indian inspector, and provides that Army officers shall be detailed to act as Indian inspectors, and substitutes therefor the existing law providing for five Indian inspectors at $3,000 each, the conference committee is unable to agree.

The bill so far as agreed upon appropriates $5,859,402.91, being $420,225 less than as it passed the Senate, $403,013.64 greater than as it passed the House, $500,747 in excess of the current law, and $2,607,407 less than the estimates for the year 1885.

The four amendments not agreed upon involve the appropriation of $15,000.

E. JNO. ELLIS.
WM. S. HOLMAN,
THOS. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ELLIS. If no gentleman desires to say anything upon this report I will move its adoption. I call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like my colleague to allow me a few words.

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question is withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have joined with my colleagues the managers of the conference on the part of the House in signing that report. While I am in favor of a liberal and enlightened policy on the part of the United States toward those Indian tribes and believe that a humane policy which will seek to elevate and enlighten the Indians and to extend to them the benefit of education is a duty which this Government imperatively owes to the remaining tribes which are rapidly disappearing, yet, sir, I can but regret that a bill involving such large appropriations should to so slight a degree inure directly and immediately to the benefit of the Indians who are designed to be benefited by its appropriations.

It is very manifest that the personnel of the Indian Bureau is too large, that the number of persons employed in countless ways that do not directly reach the Indians is far beyond the number that ought to be employed. I think the appropriations made by the House were very ample, and that a larger sum in the aggregate than that which was embraced in the House bill ought not to have been appropriated. This bill appropriates something over $400,000 in addition to the sum named in the House bill, and exceeds the appropriation last year for the present year over half a million dollars. I think the appropriations for last year were very ample.

I apprehend, sir, it will be found that Congress is moving too rapidly in the attempt to develop an educational system for the Indians, and that large sums of money now being expended in the direction of boarding-school houses and school-houses over the country and in the changing of reservations, and gathering Indians together will be found to be money expended without any palpable benefit.

But, sir, in view of the subject itself and the humane policy which this Government has adopted and should persevere in to improve the condition of the Indian tribes, a member can not well refuse, especially in opposition to the views of the gentlemen with whom he is co-operating, to give a measure of this kind his assent. Therefore I have felt constrained to give the measure my support, though I had believed the sum in the House bill was the outside sum Congress should appropriate.

Mr. ELLIS. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD].

Mr. BUDD. One of the Senate amendments agreed to by the committee of conference strikes out that part of the bill which went from the House to the Senate making Indians amenable to the same laws that whites are subject to. It was an amendment offered by myself and unanimously adopted. I offered it because on the Pacific coast and in the Territories when an Indian commits a crime he is corraled on his reservation and the courts can not punish him. Recently Judge Wingard sent some of these Indians back to the tribes for punishment. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana the reason for striking that out.

Mr. ELLIS. The conference committee concurred in the general direction of the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD]. It was their thought, as well as the thought of all good men, that the courts should be extended to the Indian not only for his punishment when he shall commit a crime, but for his protection. But they deemed they had not time, nor did they have time, to enter upon the work of making adequate provision on this subject.

The Indian is not up to the standard of Anglo-American civilization. There are many little offenses which in civilization amount to crimes that are committed by Indians by long habit and by toleration among themselves. It was deemed that if this provision should pass as it is the Indian would very often be arrested for petty offenses, taken very far away from his reservation, and subjected to great hardships; and it would be seized upon by unscrupulous officers as a means of accumulating fees against the Government. It was agreed when the next bill shall be reported some effort shall be made in the direction of the amendment of the gentleman from California.

In regard to the strictures indulged in by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I will say that nearly all the increases in this bill—three-fourths of them at least—are in the direction of the education and civilization of the Indians, and while gentlemen may complain that the bill is large, I yet state to that gentleman and to the House, and through the House to the country, that if we shall fulfill our solemn treaties with the Indians, and pay them what we justly owe them, this bill would carry eleven or twelve millions of dollars.

In regard to the point of difference between the House and Senate I have this to say: The House provision abolished the Indian inspectors and substituted for the Indian inspectors five Army officers, to be detailed by the Secretary of War, to perform this duty. As the House will remember, it gave rise to considerable debate—my friend from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] being the author of the amendment—and it was urged with much force that there were officers unemployed already, receiving salaries, who would faithfully and conscientiously discharge this duty.

On the other hand, it has been urged by the opponents of the amendment and also by the Senate conferees with much force that these Indian inspectors occupy the position of confidential agents to the Secretary of the Interior; that he must have men whom he can trust; that it is the thrusting of one department of the service on another; and that under the present arrangement the Secretary of the Interior having divided the whole Indian country into five districts and rotating or detailing one inspector to one district this month and to another next month, and so on, following each other round and round, he has constantly from different men and different standpoints accurate accounts of all that is going on, of all that appertains to the condition of the Indians on the reservations.

The House having insisted with much force on its objection, after debate the conferees on the part of the House thought it best to insist and report its disagreement to the House. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON].

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Since that amendment was offered by me to the original bill and adopted by the House I have had some occasion to inquire into the method now pursued by the Secretary of the Interior in regard to these Indian inspectors. From my intimate knowledge of Indian Affairs some years ago I am satisfied that the inspection system of the present time is a great improvement upon the old one. From conversations I have had with the Secretary of the Interior I believe the system now adopted is a good one, and so far as I am individually concerned I am disposed to allow that system to be given a fair trial. Hence I shall no longer press the proposition which I submitted to the House, but am willing to move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee of conference must be first disposed of.

Mr. ELLIS. On that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I now move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate upon the subject of Indian inspectors and agree to the same.

Mr. ELLIS. That will include amendments numbered 8, 9, 10, and 11, which are the only points of disagreement between the two Houses, and all pertain to the same subject.

Mr. RANDALL. And if agreed to by the House will dispose of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment numbered 8, as follows:

On page 4, strike out lines 7 to 12, both inclusive, as follows:
"The office of Indian inspector is hereby abolished, and the Secretary of War shall detail five officers of the Army, not under the grade of captain, who shall act under the direction of the Secretary of War as Indian inspectors; and the Secretary of War shall change such officers at any time the Secretary of the Interior shall request the same to be done."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon receding from the disagreement of the House to the amendment just read and agreeing to the same.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for a moment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I myself should have made that motion, if my friend from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] had not made it, for reasons which I have since ascertained from gentlemen who have been connected with this Indian service, among them Colonel Manypenny, formerly Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and others. Although the House sustained the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] as an experiment, I think it is now well, in consideration of the new facts which have been developed, to recede from the provision which we put upon the bill and allow the Department to keep on in its old way, so long as it is doing so well.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken upon the amendments separately. The first question is upon the motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, which has been read, and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

The ninth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

After line 12, on page 4, insert:
"For pay of five Indian inspectors at $3,000 per annum each, $15,000."

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to that amendment and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

The tenth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 13, page 4, strike out the words "Army officers detailed as;" so that it will read:
"For necessary traveling expenses of five Indian inspectors," &c.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to this amendment and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

The eleventh amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

On page 4, strike out all after the word "inspectors," in line 14, down to and including the word "act," in line 16; so that the clause will read as follows:
"For necessary traveling expenses of five Indian inspectors, including incidental expenses of inspection and investigation, $6,000."

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to this amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. That disposes of all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. THROCKMORTON moved to reconsider the various votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by mistake a bill was certified as having passed the House and so communicated to the Senate, when the fact was that it was rejected by the House. The Clerk will read an order upon the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk request the Senate to return to the House the bill of the House, No. 5682, to repeal section 22 of the act incorporating the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1871, and to declare the forfeiture of the land grant therein made, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the order was adopted.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HORR. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, &c.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. HORR. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first or formal reading of the bill.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, this bill as reported by the majority of the Committee on Appropriations is a departure from the practice of the Government for the last seven or eight years in this respect. During that period money has been appropriated in sufficient quantity merely to keep our forts now in existence in a sort of preservation, without doing anything in the line of making any new defenses or procuring any new guns.

I labor under one disadvantage in discussing this bill. I was compelled to take up this question without any previous knowledge of military science, and I am somewhat embarrassed by knowing that to-day I am obliged to talk to at least several gentlemen who have devoted their lives to the study of this question of national defenses. Let me say in the outset to them and to all here that the most I can hope to do in the remarks I shall submit is to give the results in theory and practice which have been arrived at by just such men as those I mention, and I trust they will bear with me while I travel in my hesitating, trembling way over roads that are so familiar to them.

I have no theories of my own on military matters. I have no experience which enables me to talk as some men here might do. All I shall attempt is to give some of the conclusions at which I have arrived from an examination of the literature upon this subject which has been presented by the men who have devoted their lives to its study, and who have had great personal experience in all matters that pertain to the national defense.

In doing this I trust the House will bear with me when I say that this is a question which we should examine with great care. It is a question that goes directly to the stability and permanency of our American Government; and while I admit that I enter upon it with somewhat of the zeal of a new convert, still I do hope I shall be able to satisfy this House that the bill reported by the majority of the committee is in the interest of the American people and is drawn for the purpose of benefiting our nation as a whole.

The first item in the bill is $1,000,000 for the purpose of building new forts at the deep-water harbors of the United States. These can all be numbered almost on the fingers of one hand: The ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia (or the approaches to Philadelphia), New Orleans, Hampton Roads, and San Francisco. Three hundred thousand dollars in the second item is for the purpose of commencing smaller forts at our more shallow ports, no matter where located upon the coast of the United States. Gentlemen understand well that we do not need so large guns or so expensive fortifications to defend a city where in the approaches to it the water is shallow, so that none of the first-class vessels of foreign nations can enter the harbor at all. The size of the fortification and the guns constituting its armament should be determined by the size of the iron-clad vessel of war that can enter the harbor and make the attack.

In 1816 President Madison had a board of engineers appointed to investigate and report upon the defenses of the country. At the head of that board he placed the great French engineer General Bernard. The plans which that commission or board adopted were followed from that day up to 1861, and the fortifications of the country were all built according to the plans devised by that board at that early day.

Now, you must bear in mind that when that board met and made the plans of these forts the heaviest shots that could be fired from any gun carried by any naval vessel in the world was a 42-pound shot, and these fortifications were planned to meet the attack of guns of that caliber carried only upon wooden vessels of war.

When the civil war broke out in this country in 1861 this nation was as well fortified perhaps as any nation on the face of the earth. In accordance with the plans adopted by that Bernard commission and carried out by the fathers, forts had been built which were adequate to meet the attack of any of the vessels and guns used at that time in naval warfare. Since then immense progress has been made in the art of naval warfare. Vessels have been built which are iron-clad, covered with twenty inches of steel plates. They carry guns weighing sixty tons; and to-day instead of hurling 42-pound shot at our fortifications, they can fire shot weighing 2,000 pounds—shot which will penetrate an armor of from twenty to twenty-four inches of solid plate, steel and iron, and do this at a distance of 1,000 yards. Such vessels are now owned by many nations of the Old World, and several of the second and third rate powers own such ships of war.

Consequently the forts which we built before 1861 and which were then adequate are to-day entirely worthless, absolutely of no account whatever, when they have to face the heavy guns and heavy armor of the navies of the world. Our brick and mortar forts are simply useless, and there is not one of them to-day that has a single gun in position that could affect in the least a modern man-of-war making an attack upon one of our seaboard cities.

The various nations of the Old World have been building forts for years. They have been giving close attention to this subject with great care. But we since 1861 have been asleep upon this question, so that to-day a second-class iron-clad vessel of any second-class power could steam right into the harbor of New York, levy tribute upon its people, and collect it, or destroy the city in spite of everything that the American people could do. And in the face of that fact we have a minority report of a committee brought into this House which proposes to leave our country in just that defenseless condition; whereas the report of the majority proposes to commence now to build some new forts and proposes to commence the manufacture of heavy steel rifled cannon, so as to properly defend our great commercial centers from any attacks that may be attempted in the future.

Our condition is well known to foreign nations. The absolutely defenseless condition of all our coast is well known abroad. The late minister of foreign affairs in France said to one of our own statesmen not long since, "How about your defenses? In the intelligence department of our war office," said he, "we have a drawing of every military work of consequence on the whole American coast line, with comments on their strength. There is not a first-class fortification among them all. Do you know how long it takes to build a first-class modern gun?" said this French minister. The American replied that he did not. Lacour said, "It takes a whole year. Your cities would be shelled and sacked and laid under tribute while you were creating a navy; and how could you rebuild your fortifications with 1,000-pound shells falling about the ears of your workingmen? Be sure"—now mark this—"Be sure that the defenseless condition of your country is thoroughly well known and commented upon by every power in Europe that would gladly see you humbled, for, as I said, your prosperity is a dangerous menace to all the nations of the Old World except France."

For the past seven years the Engineer Department of this country have been calling the attention of the American people to this question of public defense in season and out of season. If you will read the reports of the Chief of Engineers, General Wright, for the past seven or eight years you will find that he has warned you, that he has heaped importunity upon importunity, and done everything a faithful officer could do to arouse this nation to a sense of its weakness, to the fact of its utter inability to cope with even a second-class power.

Almost every annual message of every President for the last ten years has called the attention of Congress to the defenseless condition of the country, and the last annual message of our present Executive calls especial attention to this point, and recommends that the American Congress provide for the national defense, that it commence at once to fortify our unprotected seacoast cities.

In the North American Review for March, 1884, General Smalley, who is an authority on this question, closes an article on our defenseless seaboard as follows:

> Experiments are comparatively unnecessary. The nations of Europe have been vying with each other to obtain the most destructive ordnance and the best defenses, and have apparently reached a point where much further progress is impossible—at least for years to come, or until some new projectile force is discovered or some resisting substance invented stronger than iron or steel. We may take advantage of their position and start from the point they have reached. But at present the appropriations made by Congress are barely sufficient to keep our old-fashioned fortifications from falling about the ears of their garrisons, or our obsolete old naval hulks from rotting in their docks or foundering over their anchors.

The bill submitted by the minority of this committee is just sufficiently large to do exactly what this general says we have been doing for the last eight years past. It is simply doing nothing and will accomplish nothing for the real defense of the country. General W. B. Franklin, a gentleman of high authority in our military service, in the December number of the same review closes an article on national defense as follows:

> It is an unpleasant task to tell unwelcome truths. The person who performs it is placed in the category of those who give unasked advice.

And I ask gentlemen to mark this:

> And much treasure will be saved and national humiliation avoided if the American people awake to their duty of properly defending their coasts, a duty the cost of the performance of which is infinitely small compared to the benefit to the United States which will inure from its proper and speedy performance, and the longer neglect of which is sure to bring punishment in this or a succeeding generation.

In 1859 the government of Great Britain aroused itself on this subject. Her forts were in no better condition than ours. That government appointed a commission of six army officers and one civilian. Those army officers and that civilian were instructed to examine the needs of the fortifications at their harbors of Portsmouth, Portland, Pembroke, Dover, Chatham, and the Medway, and they were especially charged with looking after the forts that guarded the approaches to the great city of London. They made an exhaustive report, and since 1861 Great Britain has expended the enormous sum of $40,000,000 on her fortifications alone. Why, in 1860 Palmerston, in his report to the British nation, stated that they needed $45,000,000 to carry out the plans of that commission.

Every first-class power of the earth has done substantially the same thing as Great Britain, with the exception of the United States of America. We have done absolutely nothing.

Our civil war demonstrated one thing—that our old fortifications of mortar and brick were of no account against the modern guns being built all over Europe. Europe discovered that fact as to her fortifications, and immediately set herself to work to build new fortifications protected by earth embankments and iron clad. She discovered the fact that you can make an iron turret on land, and then man it with the heaviest guns and protect a nation against the navies of the world, just as well as you could with brick and mortar in 1850.

We alone of all the first-class powers of the earth have never as yet built one single fort of this kind. And to-day my friend from New York [Mr. COX] knows very well that Chili, Italy, any of these second-class powers have in their navy boats that could ride right into any deep-water harbor on the coast of the United States, and we have no fortifications or guns worthy of the name to meet their assault. Talk about the small guns we now possess! They would have no effect whatever on one of these iron-clad vessels.

One such man-of-war in the hands of a company of buccaneers could enter any deep-water harbor in this country, levy black-mail upon our cities or destroy them, and sail away with their booty absolutely unharmed. You might just as well try to stop a mad rhinoceros by firing green peas out of an old-fashioned pop-gun at his armored hide as to try to stop such a vessel from entering any harbor in the United States, for the simple reason that our forts have no guns of sufficient power to do any damage to the heavy armor of such an ironclad or to prevent her in any manner from entering and doing her work of destruction.

Now my fears for the future of these great seaboard towns may be groundless. No one will be more gratified than myself if such shall prove to be the case. But I am seeking the adoption of such a policy as shall be best for the safety, the dignity, and welfare of this nation, and am willing to take no risks. I confess, Mr. Chairman, to a weakness in favor of protecting, improving, and building up these United States in every way possible. I am in favor of all our home industries as against those of the Old Word. Could I have my way, inside of ten years this Government should have a navy commensurate with her commercial importance and worthy of a nation holding so high a position among the great powers of the earth. To do this would cost money. But such things come to no people without price.

I would also make an intelligent and determined effort to restore our general commerce upon the high seas. To me it seems a national disgrace if not a national crime that our business men are compelled to pay foreign ship-owners $120,000,000 a year for freight on our own products shipped abroad. To prevent this would also cost money. Be it so. I would make the sacrifice to secure this carrying trade to our American bottoms. I would improve all the great water ways and harbors of the country, and thereby secure cheap transportation for the products of this nation, and in that way I would benefit both the producer and the consumer. I would even go further: I would beautify and adorn this city of Washington so as to make it the healthiest and handsomest capital on the face of the earth. And then, in addition to all these things, I would so fortify and protect all the approaches to our commercial centers and to this national capital as would make them safe against the assaults of all foreign foes, and thus enable our people to pursue their peaceful avocations free from all apprehensions of danger. I would see to it that future generations should never be compelled to point out to our people when it was that this Capitol building where we now stand was destroyed a second time by some foreign foe.

One such destruction is humiliation enough for me, and to prevent a recurrence of such a national disgrace seems to me to be wise statesmanship. Now, to do all these things will necessarily involve an expenditure of money. But fortunately we have the means at hand by which to carry out all of these great national undertakings, and I would enter upon the work at once. I would do it simply for the safety, the glory, and well-being of our own people and to make the United States of America the most respected and honored nation among all the nations of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, the next provision of this bill provides for the purchase of torpedoes; but as both the substitute and the committee's bill agree substantially on the question of purchasing torpedoes, I need not take the time of the House by going into a discussion of that branch of our national defenses. Perhaps no weapons are more carefully studied or any more thoroughly improved and carefully built than the torpedoes of the present day; and yet neither of these bills gives anything like the amount that ought to be appropriated for the purchase and laying away of these most admirable means of harbor defense. Still, as the two bills agree substantially or largely upon that subject, I will not detain the House by talking upon it further.

The next item of this bill appropriates $600,000 for the conversion of our 10-inch smooth-bore guns into 8-inch rifle-guns, and for the purchase of powder and munitions of war that may be laid aside, so as to have them ready for use in an emergency. I wish to say to the committee that we have to-day about eleven hundred of these 10-inch cast-iron smooth-bore guns on hand. In their present condition they are worth scarcely anything at all. By converting them into 8-inch rifle-guns we get a weapon which answers very well for the shallow, water harbors. Once converted, they are effective for such second-class work. It costs to change each of these guns into a rifle about $2,100. When done they will throw a shot through an 8-inch iron plate at a distance of 1,000 yards.

Now, an 8-inch rifled gun much longer than these will penetrate probably about fifteen inches of iron plate. These converted guns, however, will penetrate, as I have said, eight inches of iron plate, and are sufficient for use as a defense in all our smaller and shallow harbors where heavy-plated vessels can not go because of their draught of water. But a rifled 8-inch gun such as are now being built costs $15,000, whereas for $2,100 we can convert one of these guns already on hand into a very serviceable and useful weapon. You will see as a matter of economy we should use this material now on hand, as we can in that way procure a large number of guns that will answer a certain needed purpose at a very low price.

They have been tested and tried until they are known to be a success. Several of them have already been converted into rifle-guns and have been fired from five hundred to seven hundred times, until it has been demonstrated that the gun can be used for actual purposes in regular action with safety. Hence, as I have just said, as a matter of economy we believe the nation should utilize these guns instead of going to the expense of building entirely new ones.

In this item also provision is made for the purchase of powder. I suppose many of the members of the House are not familiar with what the world has been doing in the manufacture of guns and in the manufacture of powder. There has been no part of the war material more improved and more perfected within the last fifteen years than the powder which we use in our large guns. And I am proud to say that we here in America manufacture, if not the best, as good powder as any that is made in the world.

I have here some specimens which will illustrate this subject. It is well known to expert gunners that fine powder when exploded burns so quickly that a gun could not stand the expansive force of such powder, and consequently we can not get these immense projectiles thrown as they should be by the use of the ordinary powder. They commenced experimenting, and I hold in my hand [exhibiting it] what is one grain of powder in use in the largest guns. It was also found that by making grains of different shapes an advantage is gained. Here [exhibiting it] you have an eight-sided grain of powder. That is the strongest now known in the world. It has been found that a little more surface is obtained to the bulk by making it eight-sided than is given by the cube; and they have thereby struck that mean whereby you get less expansive power and more projectile power; for it is the projectile power you are after in throwing a heavy shot.

Every grain of powder used in all the large guns in the world is run in a mold grain by grain. They are made, I say, in molds and then glazed with great care, so that they may be fitted for their work. There [exhibiting it] is a grain with holes perforated through it for the purpose of increasing the surface a little, but still keeping it within this expansive power, so as not to burst the gun but to drive the projectile forward.

The powder of the world is being manufactured with the simple view of enabling us to get the greatest velocity for our projectiles without tearing our gun to pieces. We in this country have perfected that department of our military stores; but we have not a gun in which to use a charge of that kind of powder. Why, sir, you will know something of the power of one of those enormous guns that Italy and Germany and England are now manufacturing when I tell you that to shoot one of them once takes five barrels of such powder as that, five hundred to seven hundred pounds of powder to one charge.

Of course I need not talk to you about the use of this kind of powder with our present guns; for we have not any in which we can use it to any extent and with any effect, as I shall show by and by. A modern rifled gun is of great length, and hence you can obtain great velocity for a projectile when it leaves the gun. You all understand that a shot does execution, not only in proportion to its weight, but also in proportion to its velocity. The maximum of destructive power is attained when you use such improved powder in one of these modern rifled guns.

This item also carries money for the purchase of the Gatling gun—the machine-gun. This gun has ten barrels and ten locks. It is the most perfect machine-gun known to-day, and was invented and is made in this country. Let me tell you what it will do. It carries, as I remember now, a ball about the size of the old fashioned musket-ball—that would be an ounce ball. It will fire twelve hundred of those one-ounce balls in one minute. They have recently improved this gun so that you can shoot it vertically. In that way you can drive men with it from behind any embankment, because by once getting your angle correct your balls will go up, and when they come down you can graduate it so that they can strike right where the men are at work on the other side of the embankment. It is found the balls are up about fifty-seven seconds. In coming down they get precisely the velocity they had in going up (that is one of the laws, you know, of gravitation); and the fact is that when these balls strike the ground on the other side of the fortification they pierce a plank of two inches of pine and go into the sand five inches farther, so that as a weapon there is nothing invented in modern days for that kind of warfare that compares with this gun.

These guns were tested at Alexandria, in Egypt. Two of these Gatling guns were held by four or five hundred men there when the people of that country undertook to recapture Alexandria. Four hundred men with two of these Gatling guns kept the entire Egyptian army at bay; and when they asked the commander how it happened that he could not bring his men to make an assault, what was his reply? "I could get on well enough until I struck that machine that pumped lead, and then I could not lead my men up." Now we propose to buy a few of these guns and have them ready for future use.

This is a gun that can be utilized in many conditions of a battle, they cost only about $1,200 each, and our nation should not be without a good supply of so valuable a weapon.

The next item in this bill, and it is really the largest item in it, is for the purchase of heavy steel guns. This bill carries $1,000,000 for that purpose; and further than that, it makes an annual appropriation of $1,000,000 for four years more. In other words, it sets aside five millions for the purpose of inducing the manufacturers of the United States to enter upon the building of large guns, or at least to induce them to furnish such steel as we can work up into these large rifled cannon.

To-day Great Britain has over five hundred of these large guns in position and behind modern fortifications. We have not a single large gun in this country, and not a single fort where one could be used if we had it. Just think of it for a moment. A 12-inch rifled gun weighs fifty tons, and the carriage to work it weighs twenty-five tons more. A 15-inch rifled gun weighs nearly seventy-five tons and the carriage weighs thirty-five tons more. The large 17½-inch gun which they have recently been experimenting with in Italy weighs one hundred tons and carries a shot of over a ton's weight. To work such a gun as that you must have machinery, you must have a platform made of concrete and granite upon which it can be managed. Our old forts are utterly worthless for the management of a gun of that character.

To construct such a fort as would be required will take years of labor. Pray, when shall we begin the work better than now? We must take the time if they are ever built, and why not commence when we are at peace with the world and can build these fortifications somewhat at our leisure.

It takes more than a year to make one of these large guns. If we had all the appliances, all the machinery, everything as they have in Europe, we still could not turn out a 15-inch gun in less than twelve months. What sense is there in waiting until a war is on us before we commence to prepare for it?

We can not in this country at this time make a steel gun of 8-inch caliber. Why? Because this Government has treated the manufacturers of steel in this country so that they have been unable to put up the machinery necessary to handle such great pieces of steel.

Gun steel is different from railroad steel. Those who have examined the subject will tell you that gun steel must not only have very superior elastic powers, but it must also have excellent tensile power. Every time you fire a cannon it stretches and then goes back to its former place, just as an india-rubber band does that you put around a bundle of papers. Just as surely as you discharge one of our modern guns or any other gun there must be elasticity; the gun must yield laterally when the charge explodes. Men who have given this subject study have ascertained that you may fire a gun probably thousands of times with perfect safety if you never stretch the steel of its barrel beyond the elasticity point. Do you understand me? As long as you do not go beyond the maximum point of elasticity the gun will go back to its original condition thousands of times; but the moment you go beyond the point of elasticity then it refuses to go clear back and in a little while you have an explosion. Now, the steel for first-class guns must be of the very best quality, free from flaws, with this extra tensile and elastic power.

To make one of these large guns the immense mass of steel must be perfect in every particular. In Europe they make it perfect by hammering it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]—I am sorry he is not now in his seat—in the substitute reported by him on behalf of the minority of the Committee on Appropriations, proposes to encourage American manufacturers of steel by giving $300,000 to induce them to enter upon the manufacture of these large guns. Do you, gentlemen of the minority of the committee, know what that means? It simply means not to make any guns at all; it simply means not to induce our steel-makers to try the experiment.

Why? To change the steel works of this country so that they can produce a piece of steel large enough for one of these rifled guns will require to start with an outlay of over half a million of dollars; that is, before they can make the first gun or the first piece of steel for a gun or even the first jacket to strengthen the gun. The minority of the committee propose to induce the steel manufacturers of this country, by an appropriation of $300,000, to give away $500,000, to start with, and take all the risk of the business besides.

The bill of the majority of the committee puts aside $5,000,000 to be used in the production of large guns. We take no risks, for we pay these people no money unless they shall produce steel such as is required and unless they make such a gun as we need. But we say to them, "If you do that we have money enough here in hand to give you a profitable job, to give you something to do." And the $5,000,000 is a small sum for that kind of an undertaking.

Why, gentlemen, one of Krupp's hammers that he uses in making these large guns weighs over eighty tons, and the cost of it with all the machinery for handling it is over $1,000,000. Great Britain has works of this kind now in operation where she builds these heavy guns and makes the steel also, because she has fostered and stood by these great enterprises and built them up within her own borders.

"But," says some man, "why not buy our heavy guns of Great Britain or of Germany? Can we not get them of Krupp? Can we not buy them of the works in Great Britain? Will not the Russian foundries give you a few, or rather sell them to you? Will it not be cheaper to buy all these heavy guns abroad? Why try to start such expensive works in this country if we can save money by purchasing our armaments in the Old World?"

Now, is there a man here who thinks it is the policy of the American Government to depend upon the workmen of foreign nations for our defensive armament? Is there a man who does not know that if you will give Yankee ingenuity any inducement we can make just as good steel, just as good guns on this side of the Atlantic as they can make on the other?

More than that, will it do to trust to foreign powers for such articles? When we are in trouble and need them, that will be the very time we can not get them. Consequently every principle of business requires that we should build up these institutions right here in our own country. The Old World is pursuing this policy. Germany spends its millions of dollars every year and turns them into the lap of her great manufacturer; and to-day there is no superior to the great works of Krupp that are running within her borders. Russia does this work in her own national founderies. Great Britain, France, all of them can make these guns and prepare them for their uses. We alone stand up before the world and proclaim our weakness, and then refuse to pay a dollar for the establishment of such works within our borders or to induce our mechanics to undertake these vast enterprises. Is there any sense, any patriotism, in such a course?

I believe this nation should build guns and forts to protect our great seaboard towns. I know there is a great prejudice in this country against large cities. I know we hear a great deal about the "monopolies" and the "railroad grabbers" and everything that is offensive in connection with the cities of New York and Boston and Baltimore and Philadelphia. I share nothing of this feeling I believe that the cities are of as much benefit to the country as the country is to the city. I know the country supports these great towns, but these great towns also aid the country. We could not well live without them. Why, it is true that Great Britain would not be the first power on the earth to-day but for London. London furnishes the sinews of business that make that nation the strongest financial nation in the world. London does as much for the balance of Great Britain as the rest of the country does for London. Great cities do not grow by accident. They are the creatures of commercial necessity. They are the outcome of business needs.

The property of a country naturally collects in the large cities. Every person in Kansas or in Nebraska is interested in having the city of New York and the city of Boston secure. Our accumulation of wealth must center in those large towns. It works there and flows backward and forward. Consequently it is the business of a nation to protect these exposed points. Why? I know our friends of the minority tell us in their report, and you will hear it on this floor, that the war of the rebellion taught the world one fact, to wit, that volunteer soldiers are the best in the world, and that this nation is forever secure with her volunteer soldiery ready to take up their weapons and go to the front in case of trouble. Now, that is true if we were only in danger from an invading army.

I am not afraid of the whole world bothering or pestering the United States by landing troops and putting them where we can get at them. I do not mean that I would necessarily get at them; but my friends here who went to the war would take care of them. [Laughter.] It is certain that no nation on the face of the earth could withstand the attack of an invading army more successfully than can the United States of America. But our danger is not from any invading forces. No foreign power is going to send its thousands of men to attack us on shore. Foreign nations know our weak points. Our danger is from their fitting out cruisers, armed ships of war, and sending them into these great money centers, levying contributions upon the moneyed people of the United States and destroying these great seacoast towns. They know where to make the attack. They are not going to land an army and fight us at Pensacola. That is a good harbor and a deep one. Why would they not go there? There is nothing to go there for. At Boston they can sail up and shell the city and compel its people to donate $100,000,000, $200,000,000, or $300,000,000 in order to save the city from being burned; and this they can do without leaving their ships. What is your military going to do against that kind of an attack? What has the number of men to do with a case of that kind? Whatever force might be collected by us on land would be perfectly helpless.

Mr. LONG. And an attack upon the cities is really an attack upon the country which finds its markets in the cities.

Mr. HORR. As my friend from Massachusetts suggests, an attack upon the large cities of the United States is an attack upon the entire people, because the people of the country always have a large amount of their surplus funds lying in the cities. Besides, the destruction of the cities is the destruction of the markets of the country; it breaks up the business of the country.

Now, the bill of the majority of the committee is drawn simply with the view of having this nation to start in a new way—to commence to build forts commensurate with the attack that we may be compelled to meet; to start now and build forts and guns that will enable us to defend our coast against any surprise, and prepare ourselves to ward off any blow that may in the future be aimed at our country.

I have thus given a statement of the aims and objects of this bill, and we are met in the outset with the statements that all this is unnecessary, a useless expenditure of money, on the ground, forsooth, that "no enemy is in sight;" "that we can have no foreign war," and that if we should have one we can get ready in a few days to whip the conbined nations of the world. Is it possible that we are thus secure? I know that our late war, as I have just said, demonstrated the power and efficiency of volunteer soldiers. They are equal to any emergency when we are attacked on land by an army of men.

But let me repeat, no such attack will be attempted. Our danger does not lie from an invading army. We need no forts, no 15-inch rifle-guns to withstand any such an attack. Our danger lies in an assault made upon our great and wealthy cities upon the seaboard; attack made by iron-clad men-of-war armed with heavy guns, against which volunteer soldiers or regulars can do nothing. We must meet such attacks, if at all, with iron-clad turrets; on land with torpedoes and heavy guns, against their weapons of a similar kind. But we are told no nation will ever attack us. How do you know that? As a rule nations are no better than the individuals that compose them.

The history of the world so far proves that cupidity, avarice, rapacity have been just as glaring on the part of nations as they have been in the cases of individuals. Meanness is no unusual trait in the dealing among the powers of the world. Wars so far in this world have resulted from unreasonable causes. Nations often get into trouble when there is no sensible reason for it. Bad leaders, corrupt men in high places; ambitious princes, wicked and foolish prime ministers, often compel other nations to defend themselves or be disgraced in the eyes of the world. I would have this nation, if possible, never insult any other nation on this or the other continent; but I would also have it so strong and well equipped that in the future we need never submit to an insult from any power on the face of the earth.

I have not yet forgotten that during our civil strife we were compelled to submit to one indignity after another from Great Britain, which caused every true American to hang his head in shame. I can not forget our deep humiliation at that time. I know they tell us that England has atoned for those injuries with a round fifteen million. Do not tell me that. The feeling I refer to has no money price. Such indignities can not be paid for with gold. You can not make merchandise of national honor any more than you can of personal honor. One should guard and protect the good name of his country as sacredly as he would defend the sanctity and purity of his own household. Such things are not commodities that can be bought and sold. [Applause.]

This bill is drawn in the interest of preserving our national character. What is $5,000,000 when compared with such results? We have the money on hand; why not use it in so good a work? I do not claim that we should commence these great enterprises simply because the national Treasury is full of cash. What I do claim is this: that since the work is so important, so imperatively needed, the fact that we have plenty of ready money on hand can be properly urged as a reason why we should no longer delay these great national undertakings. It is not as if we were compelled to borrow the money, though Great Britain borrowed over $25,000,000 for her fortifications alone.

Workmen in this country are just now plentiful. Material at this time is cheap. No better thing in my judgment can be done than to put several thousand men at work building these great national defenses. Do not, I beg of you, let me hear the question asked on this bill, "How much more is it than was given last year?" I should answer, five times as much. Suppose it is? Pray will some one tell me what difference that should make? The expenses of the Government must increase from year to year as long as we continue to grow. It should cost more to carry the mails this year than it did last year. It will cost more next year than it does this year.

Really, the only statesmanlike question that can be asked is, "What are the real needs of the service?" How much do the best interests of the country demand? So on this bill the first question to be settled is, "Do our seaboard towns need defense?" "Ought our Government to fortify and protect its extensive coast?" "Should we try and keep pace with the other great powers of the earth in the manufacture of heavy guns and projectiles?"

If you say to these questions "no," then this entire bill is a mistake, and all these works should be abandoned at once. But if you say "yes," then I say we should enter upon the work at once and in dead earnest.

This bill is drafted for the sole purpose of enabling the Government to commence these works now. We believe such a course is for the safety and well-being of this Republic. Then let us pass this bill like earnest, sensible men. It is drawn in the interest of no political movement. It is simply drawn in the interest of the General Government and for the public welfare, to provide under the Constitution for "the common defense." The question of "States rights" can not be raised here.

These defenses, if built at all, must be built by the General Government. States, municipalities, these great cities, would not be permitted to enter upon such work if they desired to. No one will claim that they have the right to erect a fort or control a single gun. Our fathers were wise to so arrange that the nation, the united people, should possess such power. In times of war State lines can not be regarded. The nation must be the unit then.

I know we are to meet the usual cry of "extravagance" as against this measure. There has come to be a small class of politicians in this country, or perhaps I might better say a class of small politicians [laughter], who seem to think it a mark of statesmanship to denounce every attempt to build up this country as a piece of extravagance.

These men have but one battle-cry. You hear it here on this floor. They shout it on the stump and at the hustings. It is "Extravagance!" "Extravagance!" "Economy!" "Economy!" "Can't we cut down a penny here?" "Is it not possible to take off a shaving there?" "Is there not some other place where the starvation point has not been reached?" [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I permit no man to go before me in that economy which will prevent the squandering of a single dollar of the public treasure. I would not knowingly vote a dollar for any useless purpose. In all my expenditures I would see to it that the people get a full equivalent for the money paid.

My plans would keep the wealth of the country within our own borders. In furnishing labor for the toiling millions I would so do it as to build up all the time our own country. A nation should be managed on the same sound business principles as business men use in their management of great and important business undertakings. To be niggardly is by no means always economical. Men can be careful of expenditures without being mean. Littleness is no sure evidence of good business judgment. To always try to skin a flint is not on all occasions profitable or best.

To properly carry on a great government like ours requires not only men who can master details, but those who can also comprehend large subjects and vast enterprises. A man may be able to manage a small business and still fall very far short of a statesman. He might be able to run a peanut stand successfully for years, and after all never develop into a great public financier. [Laughter.]

The question before us should be examined on a broad basis. We should endeavor to be guided by the light of the world's past history. The reasonable probabilities of the future should carry conviction to our minds. In all your speculations do not forget that every dollar of this money is to be used for the building up and defense of our common country. I know some of you will claim that she will never need any such defense. God grant that your predictions may prove true. But I am a firm believer in the wisdom of that advice which bids us "in time of peace to prepare for war." I would build the vault and put in the safe before the bank is robbed. I would lock the stable before the horse is stolen.

Full preparation, ready strength, accumulated munitions of war, will aid in keeping the other nations of the world in a friendly attitude toward us. The power to strike terrible blows will of necessity lessen the number of our antagonists.

Besides, you must not forget that nations have power and influence in this world in proportion largely to their physical strength, in proportion to their ability to defend themselves, coupled with their power to inflict injury upon their enemies. No nation which can be insulted with impunity and which has not the energy and enterprise to keep apace with the other nations of the world in matters of self-defense can be called a first-class power.

The spread of education, the accumulation of wealth, the development of the arts and sciences, the study of philosophy, all these things adorn our civilization and add to our national glory; but all of them taken together, unaided by the strong arm of national power and unassisted by physical strength—all of them, I say, unless coupled with the ability to wage a well-directed, successful, aggressive or defensive war, will not constitute us such a nation as our patriotic forefathers intended to found, nor such an one as clear-sighted, high-minded statesmen should strive to perpetuate.

Mr. Chairman, there is such a thing as national character—a just pride in the grand events of the past, a sensitiveness as to the honor and reputation of our nation's conduct, a determination to do and suffer, if need be, for the good name and fame of one's common country, a holy, devout reverence for our national emblems; a mutual feeling of sorrow and sadness at all national disgrace and national dishonor and a common feeling of joy and gladness at our national success; a sense of genuine pleasure at anything and everything which adds new luster to our nation's glory. Such feelings as these, held in common by all classes of citizens, constitute what I would call national character. [Applause.] To build up and strengthen such sentiments, to draw out and cultivate such feelings there must be constantly transpiring noble national deeds. National works must be constantly engaged in, national improvements must be constantly in progress, national defenses must be constantly growing, and the power of the nation to make itself felt in the world must be constantly developed. This bill is drawn especially to assist in the development of such national character.

Let us, then, in the discussion of this bill, rise above all partisan zeal; let us put aside all narrowness of soul; let us endeavor to grasp with broad, unprejudiced minds these great problems of state; let us take into the account the grand destiny that awaits our beloved Republic, and so act that coming generations will say that the policy adopted by the Forty-eighth Congress for the defense of the country was conceived in a spirit of true patriotism and carried out in accordance with the teachings of the highest wisdom. [Great applause.]

Mr. RYAN (when Mr. HORR'S hour had expired) obtained the floor and said: If I am recognized I will yield so much of my time to the gentleman from Michigan as he may need to conclude his speech.

Mr. HORR resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would have undertaken to address the House on this measure——

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from New York will yield the floor until I can make a suggestion. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that probably some understanding should be reached at this time in reference to the length of the general debate on the pending bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me remind the gentleman from Indiana this bill is not under my direction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had overlooked that fact.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has charge of the bill.

Mr. HORR. It is too early now to limit debate.

Mr. RYAN. Let it run on for a little while longer.

Mr. HORR. Yes, as the gentleman from Kansas says, let it run on for a little while longer; we will not be lengthy in its discussion.

Mr. ELLIS. Let the gentleman from New York proceed. I make the point, Mr. Chairman, that there is nothing before the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from New York will yield until we can come to some understanding on both sides of the House as to when general debate shall be closed on this bill.

Mr. ELLIS. I hope there will be no bargain made at this time

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope some understanding will be reached.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am on the floor just now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. COX, of New York. If it had not been for the question raised the other day about printing speeches I would not ask now to be heard orally.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. COX, of New York. I should like to go on for a little first.

Mr. HORR. We will be through before long.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Michigan in charge of the bill it seems does not at this time desire to make any arrangement about the length of the debate.

Mr. HORR. Not just now. I will after a little. I wish to hear the other side first.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, but for the discussion about printing speeches not delivered I would be glad to be relieved from delivering the remarks I propose to make. I would not deliver them at all had not my relation to naval affairs called me to study the questions involved. Nearly five years ago, as a New York member, I urged this House to make liberal appropriations for our fortifications, for guns of larger caliber, and for big ships of the best model and equipment. We may not have delayed in vain, as there is a constant advance in the arts and sciences connected with naval architecture and armaments. Indeed, by no one has this unsettled condition been better expressed than by Lieut. Edward W. Very, in his volume entitled "Navies of the World." From this I read the following:

During the past twenty years the changes in the material of which fleets are composed have been so rapid and universal that it has been impossible at any time to form a true estimate of the strength of the navy of any maritime power that would be of any value beyond a very limited time. With displacements advancing from 5,000 to 13,000 tons; weight and power of ordnance developing beyond the most exaggerated conceptions of twenty years ago; torpedo warfare springing into existence and developing as a new and special arm; modifications in engines and boilers by which speed has been developed from 12 to 18 knots, and steaming capacity from 2,500 to 6,000 miles; the revolution of naval tactics, and the entire change in the conditions of naval warfare brought about by the development of armor defense and the ram attack—it is only through paying the closest attention and under exceptionally favorable circumstances that naval officers have been able to comprehend the magnitude of the general result.

This bill and substitute came into the House in an unusual form. The bill of the majority asks for about five times as much money as the substitute of the minority. The former asks for $3,070,000, the latter for $595,000. The items vary. It is not unlikely that we can, without extravagance or parsimony, wisely take some suggestions from each. I believe in neither the monitor nor the cruiser system; hence I have so voted. I desire fighting ships of the best class.

Chief-Engineer King gives us in his exhaustive volume on war ships and navies the keynote to a true policy in the upbuilding of our Navy. He says:

The maritime power of England originated in the commercial wants of the people and become identified with them step by step in their "national progress."

What service I could render in this House on naval matters has been, first, with a view to strengthen our merchant marine, adapting it to the progress of the world in mold and materials; second, to provide defense upon our coasts by means of "great guns" of a caliber suited to that purpose and at least equal to the quality and kind of guns now used by other nations.

I am aware that all the pride of our early achievements on the sea and all the shame of our present deplorable condition have aroused a dormant national feeling in reference to both these subjects.

The question that confronts the legislation of this Congress is: How far can we go in the rehabilitation of the defenses of the country, either by fortifications and guns or by iron-clad war ships and cruisers?

NO URGENT NEED OF A NAVY.

We are told that there is urgent need of a navy. I do not admit the urgency, unless it be found in the maxim, "In time of peace prepare for war." Our peculiar situation renders this semi-barbarous maxim less applicable to the United States than to any other of the great powers of the world. Were we to be embroiled in warfare with any one or more of these powers they must come here to attack us. We have no commerce or colonial establishments to be attacked We have within our boundaries ample resources both of men and material to carry on a defensive warfare against any of the great powers of Europe or all combined.

Commerce is the bond of peace between nations. I well know that the military strength of a nation, even though unorganized, is one of its best securities from foreign aggression. I know this as well as I know that a commercial nation will hesitate long before it will provoke a war, no matter how great may be its military power. The greater the military power it will have to attack, the longer it will hesitate to declare war or give occasion for warfare. Knowing this, and knowing our I might say almost infinite military resources, I have no fear that any of the great maritime powers of the world are in the least disposed to give the American people a cause for war. Self-interest on the part of such powers sufficiently guarantees this. For the same reason, and I hope also a better one, I have no apprehension that we are disposed to provoke a war with any nation or people.

THE REPUBLIC STANDS ALONE.

Our situation and the spirit and enterprise of the American people are ample assurances that none of the great maritime powers have the least disposition to give us a cause for war.

The history of the world [says the London Times] has furnished no precedent for the condition of the United States. Hereafter Australia may exhibit a similar spectacle. As yet the North American Republic stands alone. With the conscious power to carve its own destinies belonging to perfect national independence, it combines the Roman peace enjoyed privately and commercially by subject provinces of the ancient Roman Empire. No country in the world has any interest in molesting it. None would dare gratuitously to offer it an affront or do it an injustice. Its standing army is the minutest in existence, and General Sherman, who would like it enlarged, does not desire that it should be more than minute. Except for the fear of wild Indians, or native desperadoes, it might disband the whole to-morrow and be perfectly secure. * * * Favorable geographical circumstances must be thanked in part for its immunity from many national burdens and national alarms. Unquiet and strong neighbors compel precautions generally. The United States can not be said to have more than two real neighbors; one too weak to be harmful, the other, which is great enough, possessed by the most ardent determination never to be otherwise than friendly. If even its neighbors had been among the most aggressive, its territories and its population make a solid mass, which would have insured it against attack. * * *

THE DEMANDS OF NATIONAL POLICY.

Endowed as we are with this faculty and boundless resources we need no great armaments for our defense. This fact is recognized by the honorable Secretary of the Navy. In the same report in which he recommends the remodeling of our Navy, he says in respect to "the demands of our national policy:"

The scope of that policy, as it relates to the maintenance of a military establishment, has been clearly and ably outlined by the late President Garfield, and his judicious words may well serve as guides in any action that we may take to-day. In a speech made in 1878, in the House of Representatives, he said: "The men who created this Constitution also set it in operation and developed their own idea of its character. That idea was unlike any other that then prevailed upon the earth. They made the general welfare of the people the great source and foundation of the common defense. In all nations of the Old World the public defense was provided for by standing armies, navies, and fortified ports, so that the nation might every moment be fully armed against danger from without or turbulence within. Our fathers said: Though we will use the taxing power to maintain a small army and navy sufficient to keep alive the knowledge of war, yet the main reliance for our defense shall be the intelligence, culture, and skill of our people; a development of our own intellectual and material resources which will enable us to do everything that may be necessary to equip, clothe, and feed ourselves in time of war, and make ourselves intelligent, happy, and prosperous in time of peace."

THE VIEWS OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The honorable Secretary of the Navy says that "with the views of American policy thus expressed the Department is in perfect accord;" and that "it is not now, and it never has been, the policy to maintain a fleet able at any time to cope on equal terms with the foremost European armaments." I ask close attention to the Secretary's words. The appropriations he asks for are not intended to be expended for ships fit to be the nucleus of such a navy as could cope with foreign powers.

In respect to a war with one of the great naval powers of Europe the honorable Secretary says that "the possibility of such a war is not lost sight of; but with our isolated position and traditional peace policy, it is a remote contingency, and we should cherish no ambition to take the lead among the naval powers of the world; certainly not until we again become foremost in the possession of a merchant marine." [Last annual report, Secretary of the Navy, vol. 1, page 8.]

"Any difference," says the honorable Secretary of the Navy, "which would involve us in a conflict with one of the great powers should be the growth of time, affording opportunity for gradual preparation." We may agree at present with the Secretary in his statement of our national policy. We may concur with him in regard to the remoteness of the possibility of a war between the United States and any of the great powers of the world. Such a war "is a remote contingency." We have no reasons of urgency that require any speedy or great preparation for meeting such a contingency.

But in view of this remote contingency, and in order "to assert at all times our natural, justifiable, and necessary ascendency in the affairs of the American hemisphere," continues the Secretary in the report from which I have been quoting, "we unquestionably need vessels in such numbers as fully to 'keep alive the knowledge of war,' and of such a kind that it shall be a knowledge of modern war; capable on brief notice of being expanded into invincible squadrons."

Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to the fact that we are told by the head of the Navy Department that our great and principal need of a navy at the present moment is not for defense, not for war, but only "to keep alive the knowledge of modern war." He says that "the vessels available for actual service are insufficient to give training to the officers and seamen, unequal to the present necessities of the Government"—necessities in which actual warfare is not contemplated—"and unworthy of a great and prosperous maritime state."

THE PRESENT DEMAND FOR A HOLIDAY FLEET.

The language of the honorable Secretary explains why it is that he is so urgent for "cruisers" rather than "fighters." He wants to replace the "worn-out structures of an obsolete type" with vessels more available for actual peace service, and in sufficient number to give training to our officers and seamen. All this pressure, all this urgency for a navy has for its main object this, and nothing more! We are charged with having a total disregard for the safety and best interests of the nation because we hesitate to vote millions of money from the Treasury in order to build, not a navy, but a floating annex to the Naval Academy—a holiday fleet! The urgency of the Navy Department is for "new cruisers." The ships we now have are "obsolete;" they are not fashionable enough for a training flotilla! "Hence," says the Secretary of the Navy, "provision should be made for building new cruisers, with due care and economy, by an annual outlay extending over a considerable period." "At least seven modern vessels should be built in each year until the Government has acquired a new steel navy," at an "annual expenditure of four millions."

The urgency, the great pressure brought to bear upon Congress is in behalf of the officers of the Navy, who are anxious to disport themselves in steel cruisers. This is the near and pressing urgency. They feel the need of training in modern ships, in steel cruisers, in order to be prepared for the very remote contingency of a war with the heavily-armed ironclads of one of the great naval powers of Europe. But it is not the Secretary's policy to build a fleet that would be "able at any time to cope on equal terms" with such a power.

NON-COMBATANT SQUADRONS.

Now, while I have not sufficient naval knowledge to say that we should not direct our attention mainly to providing a navy of steel cruisers for the pleasure and accommodation of our officers, before we embark to any considerable extent in the building of fighting ships, I am nevertheless well satisfied that it would be most unwise to vote $4,000,000 for the construction of seven steel cruisers next year until we have some evidence that the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin are of the proper type or types to enable our naval officers "to keep alive the knowledge of war." Are these the types of ships that are "capable on brief notice of being expanded into invincible squadrons?"

I am by no means satisfied that a fleet composed of cruisers of these types would not still leave us "a subject of ridicule at home and abroad," if, as the Secretary of the Navy thinks, we are now "justly" such "a subject of ridicule." I do not want to make the American people pay four millions a year without some annual evidence that they are not paying their money for a type of ship that will continue to make the "decrepitude" of our Navy a "subject of ridicule." I do not want to spend four millions a year on steel cruisers of the type now under construction, which even I, who am no naval expert, can see at a glance are not only incapable of being "expanded into invincible squadrons," but are also unequal to cope with first-class merchant steamers, such as the Alaska or Oregon, if these latter were equipped with the armaments with which they are to be provided in time of war.

ADVICE OF THE NAVAL ADVISORY BOARD.

The Secretary of the Navy wants us to give our first and greatest attention to the building of seventy steel cruisers—seven each year—in order to maintain our present complement of officers and sailors in that kind of a cruising fleet or training-school. The naval advisory board, whose advice we are urged by the Secretary of the Navy to follow, "expresses the opinion that the limit of combined efficiency and economy is reached in cruisers of the Chicago type, of 4,500 tons displacement." This board "condemns any policy looking to the present construction of cruisers that shall rival in speed the fastest transatlantic steamers." We are told that the reasons for this policy are: first, that at present less than one hundredth part of the ocean steam tonnage of the world is composed of merchant steamers of exceptionably high speed; second, that in time of war the high-speed merchant steamers would be withdrawn from their ordinary pursuits—that is to say, they would become armed cruisers; and, third, that in order to match such cruisers it would be necessary for us to build vessels with a displacement of at least 11,000 tons, at a cost of at least $4,000,000 for each vessel, "or nearly as much as that of all the seven ships recommended by the board." Is this a progressive policy?

QUALITIES WHICH A CRUISER SHOULD HAVE.

I do not claim for this House the profound wisdom of a naval advisory board in respect of naval affairs, but I do insist that we possess sufficient common sense to perceive the fallacy of these reasons. I would call the attention of the House to some of the views of the Admiral of the Navy in respect to the qualities which a war-cruiser should possess.

Under date of November 19, 1883, Admiral Porter made a report to the Secretary of the Navy, in which he calls the attention of the Secretary to the fact that "in case we should have a war with any foreign nation all ports will be closed against our cruisers so far as obtaining coal or munitions of war is concerned." "Our vessels," he says, "after consuming their coal must either lie idly by until a supply is sent from home or make an effort to reach the United States under sail, with perhaps fuel enough to run a blockade at the end of their cruise." "Without full sail power," says the Admiral, "a ship of war"—cruiser—"would make but slow progress under these circumstances." (See last annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, volume 1, page 390.)

DEFECTS OF THE ADVISORY BOARD CRUISERS.

The Admiral holds the opinion that an effective cruiser "should not only be fitted with a full area of square sails, but she should have all the usual jibs and try-sails, and have light stays between all the masts where the latter could be set," in addition to full steam-power. (Page 389.) He does not agree with the advisory board or the Secretary in respect to the speed of the Atlantic merchant steamers, or that proposed for our cruisers. He says that "a large portion of the ocean commerce is now carried on by swift steamships, many of which average fifteen knots across the Atlantic;" and that "in time of war the greater part of the enemy's commerce would be carried in such vessels." "Now and then," he says, "a comparatively slow steamer might fall a prey to our cruisers, but this would not often happen." The cruisers which the Admiral had then in his mind were the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin, the types approved by the advisory board; the kind of which seventy are urged to be built at an expenditure of $40,000,000, at the rate of $4,000,000 a year! The Admiral thinks that "now and then" a cruiser of such a type as any of those under construction might make a "comparatively slow" merchant steamer its prey! Are we to be denounced as being opposed to the building of a navy because we do not at once act upon the opinion of the naval advisory board when the highest officer of the Navy not only fails to indorse its recommendations but shows that if its recommendations were carried out we would still be as far as we are at this moment from having effective cruisers, much less fighting ships?

CRUISERS INFERIOR TO ENGLISH MERCHANT STEAMERS.

Admiral Porter tells the Secretary that "nearly all the European steamship lines, Messageries, Peninsular, and Oriental, &c., are composed of large and fast vessels, capable of overcoming the resistance of the heaviest seas, which would swamp a vessel of small dimensions attempting to force her way in chase." (Page 390.) The Admiral regards it as absurd to apprehend a war between England and the United States, "since their interests are so mixed up in commercial enterprises." But in the event of such a war, he says that "most of the fast steamships of Great Britain would be withdrawn from commerce and armed with heavy batteries." He says "the ocean would swarm with these converted merchant steamers, and they would effectually control it." Why does the Admiral make this statement? Because he does not regard the proposed steel cruisers—those being built and those proposed—as effective cruisers. "In case of such a war," he asks, "how long would it take for a steamship like the Oregon or the Alaska [English merchant steamers] to overhaul and capture small 'commerce destroyers?'" Let the advisory board that "condemns any policy looking to the present construction of cruisers that shall rival in speed the fastest transatlantic steamers," give us a satisfactory answer to this question before we commit Congress to the policy of building seventy ships of war each inferior in speed and cruising and fighting capacity to existing merchant steamers.

ENGLISH TYPES OF CRUISERS.

For my part I would prefer to expend $4,000,000 for one first-class war vessel that would be able to overhaul the Oregon or Alaska, and merchant steamers of that type when armed as cruisers, than have a dozen such cruisers as the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, or Dolphin, for the same money. I have no confidence in the slow-speed policy of the advisory board in this age of high speed and scientific advancements. The steel cruisers which we are now building are already behind the requirements of the day. I risk nothing in saying this when I can point to such British merchant steamers as the Oregon and Alaska. These are types of all large British merchant steamers that are hereafter to be built. None are to be inferior to these. Most of those yet to be built will surpass them. The coal capacity of such steamers would be, as the Admiral says, "tremendous." "They would carry six months' provisions and their commanders might laugh at Atlantic seas." Courtesy to the naval advisory board and the head of the Department alone prevents the Admiral from saying that commanders of such steamers would also laugh at such cruisers as the Chicago or any of those recommended by the board. We who have no technical naval knowledge can easily see that our steel cruisers, the Chicago and the others, are a mistake. They are merely "dress-parade" or "review" ships. They are not capable of effective cruising service in war-time.

THE AMERICAN TYPE OF CRUISER.

"Take the Chicago for example," says Admiral Porter; "it is said she will have only 14,000 square feet of canvas in her principal sails. Any seaman knows that so small an amount of canvas can only be considered 'auxiliary,' and would only propel the vessel through the water in a very fresh breeze." "With the very peculiar rig of the Chicago, without bowsprit and jibs projecting beyond the bow, no vessel would work under sail in smooth water, much less in a heavy sea." The Chicago has not coal capacity, even if possessed of sufficient speed, for ocean cruising in time of war. A cruiser should be able to keep the sea. How can a ship do that if she has neither coal capacity nor full sail-power? It is not proposed to build cruisers of such capacity or power. "I am not," says Admiral Porter, "an advocate for extremes, but am certain that no ship will be a first-class cruiser unless she has sail enough to send her thirteen knots through the water off the wind and ten knots by the wind. That is the speed of our old first-class frigates and ships of the line with their full bows. The finer lines of to-day ought to do better." He considers that modern cruisers, "with the enormous weight of boilers and machinery carried low down," have "a stability not possessed by the old-fashioned sailing ships of war;" and that "they could carry top-gallant sails when the latter would have to take a reef in the topsails."

THE IMPORTANCE OF SAIL-POWER FOR CRUISERS.

Before we go further into the building of cruisers, would it not be just as well to inquire into the possibility of constructing a ship with power under steam to overhaul the Oregon and ships of that class; and with sail-power capable of sending her through the water at a speed at least equal to that made by the old-fashioned first-class frigates with full bows and limited canvas-spreading stability? The Admiral illustrates the importance to a war ship, especially a cruiser, of full sail-power. "I will," he says, "suppose a case of two ships of war meeting at sea, of equal size and weight of metal. The machinery of both vessels may be injured, and both may have to depend on their sails. The one that is the best rigged and with the position of the center of effort of the sails so fixed that the steamer will work as well as the old-fashioned sailing ships (which can be accomplished) will sail around the other vessel and compel her to surrender." We are told by the Admiral that the desired result "can be accomplished." Why then should we spend $4,000,000 a year for the next ten years in building vessels like the Chicago, with insufficient coal capacity for war cruising and a rig under which "no vessel would work under sail in smooth water, much less in a heavy sea;" a rig that "would only propel the vessel through the water in a very fresh breeze?"

"It may be argued," says Admiral Porter, "that the proposed ships will not be required to maneuver, and that they will always work in important cases under steam." This argument might apply to heavy ironclads, but certainly not to cruisers. In respect to the latter he well says that "it is necessary to guard against every contingency," and that "even in time of peace every effort should be made to economize coal, the careless expenditure of which eats up the public treasure." "What a steamship consumes in coal would in a few years buy a new vessel." The Brooklyn is a very much smaller ship than the Chicago, yet this old-fashioned vessel can spread 8,000 square feet of canvas more than is intended for the Chicago.

Let us at least approach the best foreign types. Those now proposed are neither superior in speed nor equal in fighting capacity to ships designed twenty years ago.

When England and France assumed a hostile attitude to the United States during the late civil war, Congress appropriated money for 65,890 tons of fast steamers, "real commerce destroyers"—(I still quote from Admiral Porter's report to the Secretary)—"all larger than the proposed Boston class, and eleven of them as large or larger than the proposed Chicago." "Had these vessels been built of iron" (as they ought to have been), says the Admiral, "we might not at this day have been complaining of a decayed navy, since, if properly taken care of, they must still be serviceable." How many millions has Congress appropriated to maintain a navy since that time?

THE UTTER FOLLY OF A NON-COMBATANT NAVY.

Why was this mistake made? What party is responsible for not completing this fleet? for leaving most of these ships to rot on the stocks? Is it not the party that has squandered over $160,000,000 on our Navy Department since the close of that war? Are we to still follow the plans of that party for building a navy? Do not the statements of Admiral Porter show the utter folly of building a cruising fleet of the type of the Chicago and the others now under construction? "The Dolphin class of vessels," he says, "could do little in such weather as one meets with in winter on the Atlantic, although to the great ocean steamers such weather is encountered with nearly the same ease as our steamboats make the run between Newport and New York." He has little, if any, better opinion of vessels of the Boston or Atlanta or even the Chicago type as cruisers. None of them would, in his opinion, be a match for a well-armed merchant vessel like the Oregon or Alaska. And of course it is only as cruisers that our unarmored steel vessels are proposed to be commissioned. None of them dare show a broadside to any armored war ship.

THE QUESTION OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. Chairman, this question of national defense is a matter in which it behooves us to "make haste slowly." So far as I am able to judge, the naval advisory board has failed to submit a plan for the reconstruction of our Navy that should be adopted. This is certainly the case in respect to the cruisers, the only ships for which any great pressure is being made on Congress. It is proposed to make these the great feature of our Navy. The ironclads are merely incidents. In respect to the latter, their efficiency depends on the as yet unsolved problem of how to cast great guns in our founderies that will equal in range and power those now made in Europe. The ingots and the projectiles for such guns are still a matter of scientific speculation and experiment. In this condition of affairs is it not our duty to hesitate before we throw away millions of dollars wrung from the people by onerous taxation? Let us insist on having thorough investigation into the best system of offensive and defensive armaments before we squander any more public money or bind ourselves to anything that there is reason to doubt might not prove the most effective. I am willing to devote a reasonable sum of money annually for experimental purposes. We, of all nations on earth, can best wait for the results of such experiments. I am willing to build cruisers to maintain "a knowledge of war" among our officers and seamen when a plan is submitted to Congress for effective ships. I want to be committed to such ships rather than to vessels fit only for holiday naval excursions to the sunlit shores of the Mediterranean. I want something more than handsome pleasure yachts for commanding officers. Duty to the tax-payers of the country requires us to at least wait for some satisfactory results from the Chicago and the other steel cruisers now in process of construction before we undertake to spend $4,000,000 a year in increasing our cruiser fleet. The common sense of the country is entitled to more respect than this affected rage for a navy that has for its inspiration the depletion of the "surplus" rather than the completion of effective ships and proper coast defenses.

GREAT GUNS.

The Navy Ordnance Bureau is now constructing at the Washington navy-yard 6-inch, 8-inch, and 10-inch guns. They are of forged steel.

The best guns for our naval service are made wholly of steel and vary in caliber (or diameter of bore) about as follows: 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 10½, 11, 12, 15, 16, and 17 inches. The capacity to manufacture such guns in the United States is limited at present to the total construction of 5 and 6 inch guns, and to the machine work up to and including 10½ inch on other guns.

The guns we are making are all breech-loaders. These are designed to be as powerful as any guns of their caliber made abroad.

The steel for the 6-inch guns is made in this country, at the Midvale Steel Works, near Philadelphia. The steel for the larger guns could not be procured in this country, as none of the steel manufacturers had sufficiently heavy hammers to forge the large ingots required. The Ordnance Department was forced to buy this steel abroad. It was procured in England, from Whitworth, and from Cammel & Brown. One of the 6-inch guns has been finished. It has been proved at the experimental battery at Annapolis. The results show that it is equal to the best gun made abroad of its caliber.

May I be allowed to say that I had the honor to fire it off? Here is a portion of the shot or shell. [Exhibiting it.] It was so well aimed that it impacted another similar 100-pound shot. The charge was thirty-five pounds of powder of improved kind. I will not say how much and how far I retired to shoot this gun. But its thunder still rings in my ears. Other Congressmen were there—General GOFF and Judge PERKINS, who, being well protected, saw me fire it behind a hill, while they peeped through holes in a big log battery.

The largest Krupp gun is about 17-inch caliber, nearly three times the size of the gun I fired. It is possessed by Germany and will throw solid shot thirteen and one-half miles. Its projectile weighs 2,200 pounds. Its charge of powder is 1,000 pounds. One-hundred-ton guns made by Armstrong are not now afloat except on Italian ironclads—the Duilio and Dandolo. But guns of this size are now being made for England. Indeed, all governments are rearming. Guns are changing. They are doubled in length.

RECENT PROJECTILE DEVELOPMENTS.

Unarmored cruisers are of no service for the defense of ports. To have any chance of success against an attack from England, France, Italy, or Germany a powerful iron-clad fleet of vessels carrying guns upwards of 10-inch caliber is necessary. Should we have such a fleet? Not large, unwieldy ironclads for foreign service, but gun-vessels, carrying a small number of protected guns of large caliber up to sixteen inches; vessels capable of high speed for a reasonable length of time, of small draught and quick turning power. A fleet of such ships would cost comparatively little. They could be moved from point to point, and their presence would render any port secure against the combined attack of all the ironclads of the world that could be brought across the ocean against us.

Another mistake of these unarmored cruisers is not only their lighter guns, but their inability to keep out of range of the projectiles of the machine-guns which form a large part of the armament of a modern ironclad. By machine-guns I mean such guns as are made by Hotchkiss, an American, who, finding no market for his productions at home, went to France, established his factories, and now supplies the world with guns of from one to three inches caliber, capable of firing projectiles from twenty to forty times a minute. The lightest of these guns would pour their rain of fire through and through the sides of these steel cruisers at 1,000 yards' distance. The heavier calibers could send twenty shots per minute through four inches of armor.

The new ironclads of Europe carry as many as thirty of these destructive weapons. Should one of the "cruisers" meet a vessel of this kind, its light sides would soon be a sieve of holes from the fire of the machine-guns alone.

This machine-gun fire is a development of the last three years. Intelligent naval men agree that it is bound to completely change the system of maritime warfare. They say that it will be impossible for an unarmored ship to live against such a furious fire. Ships must be armored to protect men, magazines, machinery, and guns against these new machine-guns alone.

A gun capable of firing a six-pound shell which can pierce four inches of steel, and with a range of four miles, would have seemed impossible three years ago. But when such a gun can be fired twenty times a minute, and when a vessel has thirty of them, that is, a capacity of six hundred shot per minute, one of the great changes necessary in naval warfare and in the protection of ships is strikingly apparent.

I am told that the 6-inch guns of the steel cruisers will pierce ten inches of iron, and the 8-inch guns fifteen inches of iron. This penetration may possibly get through the armor of the second-class ironclads of foreign navies. But these guns can be fired only very slowly—possibly one shot in three minutes with the 8-inch guns, and one per minute with the 6-inch gun. Hitting an object at sea is a difficult matter. In the smoke and excitement of action it is hard enough to hit on land; but with the unsteady platform of a ship at sea, the confined space in the battery, and a quickly moving target, many shots must miss their mark. However courageous officers and crew may be they would stand but a small chance of getting in one lucky shot, while the unprotected sides of their ship are but as paper for a protection against the rain of projectiles from the new machine-guns.

We must have ironclads to protect our ports; ships clad with light armor to keep out machine-gun projectiles, and with their vitals protected by thick plates of steel, strongly backed with solid oak, so as to be impervious to the shot of any gun that may be likely to be brought against them.

THE NEW POWDER.

Powder plays an important part in gunnery and war. Perhaps the new powder referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] may take its place in the economy of explosion.

Perhaps the new Krupp gunpowder may come in to displace our present black compound. It is within my own observation that there is at the Annapolis experiment yard a new powder, invented by Captain Folger, working wonders and making dynamite problematical. Get a powder with thinner smoke, with a faculty to disappear quicker, or obtain such a relative proportion of ingredients as to make a greater degree of carbonization of the wood from which the charcoal is made, and you may change the gun by changing the chemical conditions of the explosive substance.

COMMENDABLE CAUTION.

The House may take pride in its caution and economy. We need heavy vessels on the ocean; and we require big guns on them and on the land. Rear-Admiral E. Simpson as president of the Navy Advisory Board, in a letter dated April 11, 1884, endeavored to prefer the fightless cruiser to the armored vessels of fighting quality; but truth crept almost unaware on his caution when he gave reasons paramount for the armored ships. He really favored one armored vessel to be under constant construction. He says, as to the construction of such a vessel, that it will take three years; and the cost would be $2,500,000. One such vessel is worth a half-dozen of flighty holiday cruisers. Hear what he says:

The length of time required for such constructions is from three to five years. They are very costly and will involve much study and careful preparation; besides the selection of a type will be a matter requiring much deliberation.

In relation to the last point—the selection of a type—I submit general dimensions and some particulars of two armored vessels, which represent the most advanced ideas of the present day. One of these would most probably be the character of the vessel that would be recommended by such a body as the advisory board.

Her Britannic majesty's steamship Imperieuse, not yet completed, was commenced in 1881. She is called an armored cruiser, and is intended for service on foreign stations where fast unarmored ships may have to be opposed and where second-class ironclads may have to be engaged. Her dimensions are as follows: Length, 315 feet; beam, 61 feet; draught, 25 feet; displacement, 7,400 tons; indicated horse-power, 8,000; speed, 16 knots.

The battery will consist of four 9.2-inch guns, each mounted in an armored barbette, and six 6-inch guns in broadside. The barbettes are arranged one forward, one aft, and the others abreast of each other at the sides amidships; the heavy guns are thus situated at twice the height from the water that they would be in a turreted ship, and can be fired three together in any direction. The speed and armament here described does not greatly exceed that of the Chicago, but the difference in displacement of 2,900 tons admits of the following armor: Throughout the length occupied by the machinery and boilers (139 feet), the sides are protected by 10 inches of compound armor for a depth of 8 feet; the deck over this is 1½ inches thick; bulkheads of plating 8 inches thick run athwartships at the forward and after extremities of the side armor, thus forming a citadel inclosing the machinery and boilers. Forward and abaft of the citadel, at the level of its lower edge, extends a protective deck 3 inches thick, sloping downward to the sides, as in the Boston and Atlanta. The barbettes are 17 feet in diameter, and are armored with 8 inches of steel, which protects the machinery for turning, elevating, and loading the gun, and an armored shute leading to below the armor deck makes the passage of ammunition safe and rapid. The pilot tower is protected by 10 inches of armor.

Contrasting the protection afforded by the armor above stated with the vulnerability of the Chicago, the advantage of the increased displacement of the Imperieuse becomes apparent.

Another type of vessel that would come up for consideration is the turreted ship Riachuelo, just completed for the Brazilian Government by an English firm on the Thames. Her dimensions are as follows: Length, 305 feet; beam, 53 feet; draught, 20 feet; displacement, 5,700 tons; indicated horse-power, 6,000; speed, 16 knots.

The armament consists of four 9-inch guns in two turrets and six 6-inch guns on the upper deck. There is an armor belt of eleven inches thickness covered by a two-inch deck, and the turrets have ten inches of armor.

The armor protection is by no means so complete as that of the Imperieuse, nor is the arrangement of the battery so effective, but, on the other hand, the speed is greater and the displacement is 1,700 tons less.

These instances are cited to show that a board can not, except after the most careful study and examination, decide upon even the size and general dimensions of an armored vessel best suited for our purposes. Therefore, in suggesting the form for an act of Congress which will best carry out the recommendation I make in this communication, and estimating the time required for completing the vessel as three years, I would propose that the authority should be given somewhat in the following form, namely:

For the construction of one armored vessel of not exceeding 7,500 tons displacement, $1,000,000; such vessel to be constructed under the same conditions as prescribed for the construction of the steel cruisers, and its armor and armament procured at a total cost not to exceed $2,500,000.

IMMENSE FOREIGN VESSELS.

Lieutenant Very gives in his volume a list of the vessels of various nations. From this I will mention a few of the larger ships and their characteristics.

The largest ironclads are the Italian ships Italia and Lepanto, 13,480 tons, 15 knots, 21 inches steel backed with 4 feet of oak; Dandalo and Duilio, 10,650, 14 knots, 24 inches steel backed with 4 feet of oak; all four armed with four 17½-inch 100-ton guns and with four 4¾-inch guns. In addition to these Italy has sixteen ironclads of smaller size, but each stronger than anything we have.

Of British ships the Inflexible is of 11,500 tons, has 24 inches of compound armor and a speed of fourteen knots, carrying 16-inch guns. The Ajax is of 8,492 tons, has 19½ inches of compound armor, speed thirteen knots, and carries four 12½-inch guns. The Devastation is of 9,157 tons, has 13½ inches of compound armor, speed fourteen knots, and carries 12-inch guns. The Dreadnaught is of 10,886 tons, has 15⅝ inches of armor, speed fourteen knots, and carries four 12½-inch guns. Great Britain has fifty other vessels of war clad with from 5 inches up to 19½ inches of armor.

Of French ships the Admiral Duperre is of 10,315 tons, has 23 inches of armor, and carries four 13½-inch guns and fourteen 5½-inch guns, with a speed of fifteen knots. The Dévastation is of 9,630 tons, has 16½ inches of armor, carries six 12½-inch guns and eight 5½-inch guns, with a speed of fourteen knots. France has fifty-three other war-ships clad with from 5 inches to 16½ inches of armor.

Of German vessels the Kaiser is of 7,440 tons, with 11½ inches of armor and a speed of fourteen and a half knots, carrying eight 10½-inch guns and one 8¼-inch gun. The Prussian is of 6,748 tons, has 10½ inches of armor, with a speed of fourteen knots, carrying four 10½-inch guns and two 6¾-inch guns. Germany has twenty other war ships clad with from 3 inches to 11½ inches of armor.

Of Japanese vessels there are the Foo-Soo-Kioan of 3,718 tons and 9 inches of armor, with a speed of thirteen knots, carrying four 9½-inch guns and two 6¾-inch guns, and four others with 5 inches of armor.

Chili has the Almirante Cochrane of 3,430 tons, 9 inches of armor, speed thirteen knots, carrying six 9-inch guns and two 4-inch guns; and two other ships with 5½ and 9 inches of armor.

The New York Times has given a description of the new British-built Brazilian man-of-war. I insert it here for our admonition:

The Brazilians have just added to their navy a British-built ironclad—one of the most formidable vessels afloat—which has a speed of seventeen and a quarter knots. The Chicago can carry eight hundred tons of coal, and burns it so fast that it will last only six and a half days. The Brazilian ironclad carries the same amount of coal, but burns so much less than the Chicago that she can steam continuously for twelve days. The Chicago will have no guns fit for a modern cruiser, for the reason that there is not a foundery in this country that can make an 80-ton rifle, much less a larger gun, while the Brazilian vessel is more heavily armed than any vessel afloat except the new Italian ironclads. She can fight, chase, or run away from an enemy; but the Chicago can escape only from a slow antagonist, and can fight nothing more formidable than a merchantman.

MILLIONS SQUANDERED UNDER PRETENSE OF BUILDING A NAVY.

We have been without a navy for almost twenty years. In all that time the party in power has not made one honest effort to build a navy. It has enriched some parties by squandering millions of money under the pretext of building a navy. And now when we refuse to adopt this dishonest policy are we to be cited as being opposed to the building of a navy? Oh, no, my friends! You can not charge us with opposition to a navy. Our opposition is not to a navy, but to a fraudulent navy, a sham navy, a navy that can not fight, that can not cruise, that can not cope even with a good merchant steamer of modern type. Our opposition is against jobs. We want to begin at the foundation; to build anew rather than to go on developing the obsolete. Our navy-yards are useless for legitimate purposes. They have degenerated into political machines. Our gun-founderies are yet to be built. Everything requisite for a navy or for effective coast defense has yet to be designed. We have to build from the bottom up when the designs are submitted. All plans submitted are immature. Everything is in embryo except the "surplus." That is ready; and so are the men who are anxious to go into it "up to the elbows." To get a "big grab."

PROTECTION OF HARBORS AND COAST.

But it is said, we must be prepared for war. Be it so. Let us now enter upon that preparation. Let us do whatever is necessary and proper to that end, the most necessary and the proper first. Is the protection of our commerce included in this necessity? No. What then? The protection of our harbors and coast? Yes. This, then, is the first necessity.

I have not been averse to proper precautions and timely appropriations and appliances to build guns for the protection of our coast. Long since, in a speech on the 12th of December, 1879, on the fortification bill, I showed the exposed condition of New York and other large coast cities. I urged action in the making of defenses on the coast. What is recommended by one of the Senate amendments I proposed then. I favor the same wise forecast and provision now. I shall, with permission, append the remarks I then made.

Our defenses by "great guns" is the most necessary thing. In what shall this defense consist, if not in guns to meet those of other nations? Is it in forts, guns, floating batteries, torpedoes or rockets, gunpowder or dynamite? Does any gentleman know any better mode of defense now? Has military science yet determined? If not, let us pause. It is already known that no ship can float with steel armor thick enough to be impenetrable by shot fired from the best guns. In a contest between steel-clad ships armed with such guns, it is simply a question of gunnery, courage, and maneuvering as to which shall sink, disable, or capture the other. It is the same question as in the days of wooden ships and 32-pounders. To fight a naval battle to-day a nation must have steel-clad ships and modern guns. What will be the armor of to-morrow? To defend a harbor against ships as now equipped, we must rely on guns of equal range and force with those on the attacking ships. However large our navy might be, land defenses would still be necessary. The gun is the main thing to be considered. Therefore let us attend to the main thing and the necessary thing first. If we can defend our coast and harbors, and have no commerce but the enemy's to look after, can we not rely on American skill to provide the "destroyers" when the occasion comes for havoc upon the defenseless, white-winged messengers of commerce? We have seen how powerless ironclads and the best guns of the time were for the protection of merchant ships against swift wooden cruisers like the Alabama. Speed and not fighting qualities is the main requisite for commerce-destroyers; propelling power, not engines of war; flight from battle, not courage; dashes at the defenseless instead of at the defenders. It is a very easy matter to equip commerce-destroyers. The maritime powers of Europe, especially England, know how easy. Their commerce is far more vulnerable than any of our ports would be when defended by approved artillery.

DESTROY CRUISERS RATHER THAN COMMERCE.

I am not inclined to favor the destruction of commerce. If we must have "cruisers," let them be of a class that can overhaul and destroy the cruisers of the enemy. If the military policy must still be maintained in this late day of the Christian era, let us have ships that will be more eager to meet men-of-war than merchantmen. I would still maintain some of the spirit of chivalry to ameliorate the rigor of war. Let our naval commanders have ships in which they can emulate the achievements of the historic Porters, Hulls, Decaturs, and Perrys. They commanded fighting ships such as the Essex, the Constitution, the United States, the Wasp, the Hornet, and the Enterprise. These ships were equal to the best of the period. Each of these compelled, in single combat, the surrender of a British war-ship. Here is a list of a few of the conquests of our old fighting ships:

Date.	American vessel.	Guns.	British vessel.	Guns.
Aug. 13, 1812	Essex	32	Alert	20
Aug. 19, 1812	Constitution	44	Guerriere	49
Dec. 29, 1812	Constitution	44	Java	49
Oct. 25, 1812	United States	44	Macedonia	49
Oct. 18, 1812	Wasp	16	Frolic	22
Feb. 24, 1813	Hornet	18	Peacock	22
Sept. 5, 1813	Enterprise	14	Boxer	18

I want our naval officers to have ships in which they can emulate Perry, who, with a small squadron mounting only forty-four guns, captured a British fleet carrying seventy guns, not allowing a single ship or flag to escape. If we are to have a navy, let it be one that can achieve such victories as this, so that it may be said of us as was said in the war of 1812–'14:

Have we not accomplished more than did Spain with her "Invincible Armadas," than did Holland with her De Witts, Von Tromps, and De Ruyters; than France could achieve when she was in the zenith of her naval power; than did Great Britain with her Nelsons, Rodneys, Howes, and St. Vincents? The naval annals of England furnish no instance in which every vessel belonging to a hostile fleet was captured.—Annals of Congress, Thirteenth Congress, 1813-'14, volume 1, page 1240.

It takes time and money to build ships of the modern type that will accomplish such victories. We have both of these. But is there any pressing necessity for cruisers that can neither chase nor fight?

THE FLEETING FASHIONS OF NAVIES.

How long will steel-clad navies be the fashion? Does any gentleman know? Will they be popular if the dynamite air-gun or rocket should prove to be a success? Imagine a squadron of great ironclads like the English Warspite, Impérieuse, and others of from 7,000 to 10,000 tons displacement off New York Harbor, and a swift "mosquito fleet" in the harbor, armed with dynamite guns and rockets, with steam up and ready to dash out upon the enemy at night! Would not the big ironclads be as vulnerable before such a mosquito fleet as an unwary traveler who had provoked the occupants of a hornet's nest? Why this haste when the modes and munitions of warfare are in such marvelous evolution?

DYNAMITE AS A DIFFUSER OF THE GOSPEL OF PEACE.

It has been claimed for gunpowder that it has been not only a great civilizer but also that it has contributed in no small degree to the spread of the Gospel. We may, I think, confidently claim higher civilizing capacity for dynamite and credit it with considerable power for diffusing the gospel of peace among the nations. All that is necessary to the accomplishment of these grand objects is the invention of a proper destructive projectile-machine or engine. Can we doubt that American ingenuity, using the "elements of subtle flame," will not soon supply this want? If any incentive is necessary, let us, in the interest of civilization and peace, vote for the offer of a large reward to the inventor of a dynamite cannon, catapult, ballista, arrow, or rocket of sufficient range to engage an enemy armed with the best gunpowder artillery.

DYNAMITE EXPERIMENTS.

A week ago dynamite was the terror of the world. It may be still. But who can tell what a day may bring forth? Read what is here sent me from our dynamite experimental grounds. I have at home the photographs of this at present ineffectual experiment:

Much has been said lately about the distructiveness of dynamite, some people going so far as to assert that a few pounds exploded on the side of an ironclad would shatter the neighboring plates and crush in the side. Were this true, leaving out the difficulty of placing the charge in the right place, the great expense necessary to construct heavy ordnance might be saved, and the utility of heavy armor seriously doubted.

The unfounded assertions of persons interested in the dynamite gun have given a sense of security to many which the results obtained at Annapolis do not warrant.

The target was composed of ten iron plates, bolted against twenty inches of oak, a structure of much less strength than the side of the weakest of modern ironclads. The experiments commenced by firing a few pounds of dynamite several feet away, and as no effect was produced the distance was decreased and the charge of dynamite increased until twenty pounds were fired in direct contact with the target; the effect then was only a slight indentation of the plate.

The charges of dynamite were then increased until seventy-five pounds were exploded in contact with this effect: an indent of seven inches deep and three feet in diameter, the outer plate slightly cracked and the bolting considerably strained, but not so as to cause the target to fall apart. This was after two hundred and sixty-five pounds had been fired against it in all, no repairs having been made in the intervals.

The proposition has been made to fire the dynamite in shells, but the shell of the 100-ton gun only contains about eighty pounds.

The effect against the side of a modern ship armored with steel plates of from ten to twenty-four inches in solid thickness, backed with from fourteen to fifty inches of solid oak, can be estimated as nil. A single shot from the gun you fired the other day would have completely pierced such a target and probably shaken it to pieces.

NAVAL ARCHITECTURE AND EQUIPMENT.

Mr. Chairman, ship-building, especially the building of war ships, must always be experimental work. Naval architecture is not yet an exact science. Construction and stowage are still in theory. Experts differ with great acrimony on these matters. You may build on the most approved theory of construction, and for some unaccountable reason fail of success. If you succeed in your architecture, there still remains the problem of "stowage." The stowage of a ship has reference to stability, speed, easiness of motion, and economy of space. You must distribute your ballast and other disposable weights so as to increase the stability of the ship and maintain her upright position. You increase this stability by increasing the depth of the center of gravity below the center of buoyancy or displacement. You will understand the difficulty and importance of stowage when you call to mind the rule that any weight influences the position of the center of gravity of a ship in exact proportion to its distance from that point—a small weight at a certain distance producing the same effect as double that weight at half the distance. We must consider also the momentum of the weight in motion, as when the ship is pitching or sending.

The science of naval architecture and equipment is not yet laid down in the books. It involves undecided questions of physics and the developments of chemistry, more than progress in navigation. We can better afford to await these developments than any other maritime power on earth.

PLANS TO GET AT THE SURPLUS.

Objections are made to cutting down our surplus revenue. Plans for the most wasteful extravagance of public money are boldly introduced in Congress. Every excuse is made that can be invented to ward off an issue on financial economy and moderate revenue. This sudden demand for a useless cruiser navy is one of the excuses to do this, to keep up the taxes. There are men in this country who, if clothed with the power, would not hesitate to plunge the country into a foreign war, just to prove to the people how much we need a great navy. Does it not look very suspicious that this cry for a navy was not raised until we became incumbered with the "surplus," and reduction of taxation became the inevitable issue?

SHOW THE NATIONS HOW TO LIVE AT PEACE.

I do not care to spend our surplus without results. God save the Republic from the machinations of men who are raiding it! It behooves the country to see that they are not clothed with power to accomplish their designs. I prefer to cultivate the arts of peace rather than to promote warfare. I adhere to the doctrine of the fathers that "the welfare of the people is the great source and foundation of the common defense." We need no great standing armies or navies or commissioned cruisers in time of peace. We have ample time to devise and execute plans for defense in the very remote contingency of a foreign war, if the affairs of state are intrusted to those whose endeavor it will be to cultivate amity with the nations and extend our commerce. No great nation desires aught but amity with us. God has blessed us in position and in the endowment of almost infinite resources of power. We sit under the vine and the fig-tree, none daring to make us afraid. Does He not say to us in Holy Writ, that a time will come when men shall beat their spears into plowshares and their swords into pruning-hooks, and when the nations will learn the arts of war no more? Is it not time at this closing nineteenth century of the Christian dispensation for some of the nations to move forward to the hastening of the promised day of peace? Are we to continue always in the unholy strife of nations, we who are blessed with all the power to inaugurate the glorious era of peace on earth and good-will toward men? Why should we not urge on the work of the Peace Congress? Why should we not urge upon the army-ridden masses of Europe the doctrine of international arbitration, rather than follow the barbarous methods of great armaments? Let us show to the nations how to live at peace with great and powerful neighbors. Let us show the nations by our example that when the people dethrone despots and make their own laws, and are just, industrious, and intelligent the day will have come to them, as it has come to us, when a standing army or a great navy is no longer a national necessity.

THE SCIENCE OF WAR.

It is not for me to say what is the true science of war, nor is it for me to instruct in the art of war. At best, it is said that war is human butchery. If our admirals and generals must have war as a profession, if they must deal in blood, let them go to the shambles and learn of the butcher a lesson of skill and humanity. He does not destroy his victim by piecemeal or mangle him in detail. He is more merciful; he understands his business better; with well-directed aim he seeks a vital part; having reached that his work is easy.

Therefore, to lessen human warfare let us cultivate the highest chemistry and make the most deadly armament. I but repeat the words of one of our early legislators when I say that although we may be weak in aggressive power, in capacity for defense we are invincible. If in self-defense cowards become brave and the weak are clothed with more than mortal strength, it needs no prophetic vision to perceive what our country could accomplish if invaded by a foreign foe.

Self-defense is original, native, indelible in the human heart. As was said by the Roman orator, "It is not formed by habit, nor induced by custom, nor written, like the variable laws of nations, on brass or marble, which are corrupted by time, but engraven by the finger of the Creator in the bottom of our souls, and immortal as our existence."

I am not visionary enough to suppose that we can at once inaugurate peace and civilization among the nations. But I do hold it to be our duty to move in that direction; to use all our own influence and expend our best efforts in that direction with at least as much energy as we display in warlike preparations. I hold that it would be a better, safer, and more honorable policy for us to urge a general international disarmament than to try to emulate the slaughtering policy of European tyranny. I challenge any man who professes Christianity, who believes in the Word of God, to question the soundness of these views. I do not say that we may not need to exercise our military power. I think it is possible that we may. But it is only a possibility.

Holding to this possibility I believe it to be my duty to vote for the execution of any plan of defense that will give promise of the proper results. But at the same time I believe it is equally our duty to set before the world the example of a nation that can maintain itself by the inherent power that pertains to freedom, intelligence, and a rule of the people, for the people, and by the people.

APPENDIX.

[Remarks in Congress December 12, 1879.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this is an age of mechanical forces. The nation which is laggard in their application will lack in maintaining its interests and honor. The nation which is not provident by its legislation in the use of recent inventions is in constant peril. Even powers weaker, in many repects, with the improved armanent of our time become superior to those who are greater in other resources. It will not do to rely on Divine Providence altogether for our future defenses. Ericcsons, with their monitors, are not to be improvised every day against the surprises of Merrimacs. The engineer may contrive, mechanical processes take time; but the nation that has both is the victor. The needle-gun gave Germany its triumph over France; the American rifle, in Turkish hands, held Russia back at Plevna. Whitworth, Whitehead, Krupp, and Armstrong, with the great establishments for making ordnance on the Continent and in Great Britain under their auspices and direction, are the real heroes of the future. They are organizing victories at their desks. Even Peru and Chili fight with weapons forged in Europe.

How much, sir, depends on the evolving of certain gases in chambers of iron; how much of destiny to nations! The problem of the invulnerable, represented by "Thunderers" and "Inflexibles," and solved by the penetrable, under certain chemical, explosive forces, is the problem of national greatness. Maximae minimis suspendens.

If gentlemen would know the great controlling element in our own civil war, they will find it in General Meigs's quartermaster's report of the amounts expended in mechanical forces. The superior enginery and invention of the North gave victory on many a hard-fought field to the North, despite the most conspicuous chivalry and self-sacrificing personal bravery of the South.

I make these remarks in limine, so as to illustrate the necessity of providing for our defense against the day of trouble and against those nations who have already superior means of warfare.

From chance remarks about my seat, I fear that the defenselessness of our coasts is not appreciated. Here is a picture of a possible peril taken from the Army and Navy Journal:

"In New York Harbor stands a fort whose largest artillery has a range of four and a half miles and throws a missile weighing four hundred and fifty pounds; a few feet beyond the four and a half miles is a European ironclad, which, unreached by the missiles of the fort, throws from its forward guns, which have a range of nine miles, twenty-five-hundred-pound shells into the heart of New York, while with its after guns it sinks a few little American ironclads, penetrating their armor with ease."

Let this picture stand for every other exposed city on our coast. It shows at a glance what the situation may be in case of foreign complications and war. As a member from the city of New York, is it not my duty to call the attention of Congress to its peculiar exposed condition? The monster guns and gun machinery of other nations turned out on the Mersey, Clyde, and Tyne, and the heavy steel armor of the ships, even of such second-class powers as Brazil, Italy, and Spain, warn us to be provident, vigilant, and progressive, if we would protect our seaports and cities and vindicate our national position.

When it is considered that the city of New York for the past five years has paid over two-thirds of the Federal revenues; that three-fifths of the foreign exports leave the port of New York; that for the past quarter of a century she has received three-fifths of the merchandise imported into the United States, and that during that period one-half of our domestic exports have left that port; and when the immense aggregate of hundreds of millions of these interests are considered, a Representative of that city would be faithless if he did not present the startling facts connected with the unguarded condition of such immense interests thus concentrated in New York city.

I do not, Mr. Speaker, criticise the sum reported by the Appropriations Committee for the armament of seacoast fortifications. It might have been increased, especially in view of the need of improved rifled cannon, which other nations already have.

Gentlemen have asked for information as to the conversion of smooth-bore guns into rifles. Some doubts were thrown over the feasibility and utility of such "conversion." Allow me, if not for the present yet for a future occasion, to insert here a statement which will remove these doubts:

"The Ordnance Bureau has very judiciously applied the meager appropriations which have been annually made by Congress for the last few years for the construction of heavy ordnance ("cutting the coat according to the cloth") to "converting" a few of the cast-iron smooth-bore guns now useless and otherwise valueless except as old material, of which the Government has many hundreds on hand, into rifled cannon of somewhat reduced caliber by boring them out to receive an interior barrel constructed of wrought-iron bars coiled into a spire and then solidly welded together by a peculiar process into a compact mass, for the manufacture of which one of the existing gun-factories has, fortunately, the requisite machinery and experienced workmen.

"The barrels or tubes are inserted into the old cast-iron casings and secured in place by a ring or collar screwed on to the muzzle of the piece, on a system adopted by the Ordnance Department after a course of preliminary experiments made at the recommendation of a commission of its officers which was sent to Europe in 1873 to examine the different systems of rifled ordnance adopted by Great Britain, Prussia, France, and other countries, and select such as they should consider preferable, or at least most suitable, for use in our country in respect to efficiency, and, pre-eminently, economy.

"In the manner described have been converted, since 1874, some one hundred and fifty of the one thousand or more of the cast-iron guns (market value 1 cent per pound) of ten inches diameter of bore, belonging to the War Department, into rifled cannon of eight inches diameter of bore, and some fifty of the eleven inches bored guns of the Navy Department into similar 8-inch rifles.

"It may be mentioned in passing that these fifty guns are the only pieces possessed by the Navy Department of modern construction, except a dozen breech-loading rifles of about 6½-inch caliber, which have been made by 'converting' 100-pounder 'Parrott' muzzle-loading rifled guns, the most serviceable of their day in use anywhere, but not calculated to sustain the heavy battering charges now necessary for service against heavily armored vessels. Being reinforced by insertion of an interior steel barrel from the rear, and supplied with breech-loading mechanism, they become again very serviceable and effective pieces of their caliber, equal to the requirements of present service.

"The cost of conversion of the 10 or 11 inch guns into 8-inch rifles is about 13 cents per pound of the finished weight of the piece, and adding 1 cent per pound for value of the useless smooth-bore gun converted we have, at the cost of 14 cents per pound, a good serviceable rifle of about eight tons weight, throwing projectiles of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred pounds, fairly comparable as to range and effective force with the best guns of similar class of the systems of Krupp, Woolwich, or Armstrong, and far below any of them in cost. Their missiles are capable of perforating the armor of most of the iron-clad war ships of Europe at a distance of 2,000 yards, but of course they could not successfully contend against the mammoth cannon of thirty-five, fifty, seventy-five, and one hundred tons weight, mounted upon some of those great floating batteries."

I trust that this statement will remove any uncertainty or doubt as to the utility of this process of "conversions."

There are other facts and suggestions referring to the armament of our fortifications which concern New York city which should be understood by the House, if not for present action, then for future consideration.

The Chief of Ordnance of the United States has again called the attention of Congress to the defenseless condition of the country. He has for many years in his annual report furnished to the Secretary of War and through him to Congress important facts touching the coast defenses.

In 1873, President Grant in his annual message referred particularly to the needs of the Ordnance Department, and in January, 1875, he sent a special message to Congress urging that body to furnish the needed legislation. No notice was taken of this appeal.

Upon Congress now rests the responsibility, and it is one of no ordinary import, looking to possibilities near or remote.

The Chief of Ordnance this year asks for less than a million of dollars, to be used for the conversion of old and for making new guns of suitable force for coast and harbor defense. (See his report for 1877, 1878, 1879, and for previous years.) The bill before us gives less than one-fifth of this sum, and therewith out of economic reasons we must be content.

At present the country is at the mercy of even the most unimportant maritime nations in the world.

It takes nearly two years to complete and test a gun of large dimensions. The first and last and only large rifled cannon ever cast in this country was delivered to the Government in January, 1878. It took just eighteen months to finish this gun. Krupp requires two years or more to make a large gun. Up to 1866 most of the improvements in ordnance originated in this country. The same is true of projectiles, powder, and gun metals.

It appears from official reports that we have on hand three hundred 15-inch smooth-bore cannon. When these were made they were the largest in the world, and up to 1866 the most powerful. They are comparatively useless now, except for conversion into 11-inch rifles, which are very effective guns.

Every city, large and small, situated on our seacoast from Maine to California is directly interested in this question of coast defense. Under no conceivable circumstances could we arm our coast fortifications effectively in a less time than three or four years, even if all the available gun-machinery in this country and all the money in the Treasury were to be placed at the disposal of the ordnance officers.

England is already bountifully supplied with modern ships and guns. She appropriates every year nearly $10,000,000 for new guns and equipments for them.

Krupp, in Germany, employs in his works about 14,000 men, and Sir William Armstrong, in England, about half that number. Our works, General Benét says, are and have been practically idle for nearly ten years.

China is keeping up with the times, and is sending agents abroad to look up improvements. For some time she has been giving orders for war material of modern description.

All the gun-factories in France are at work, and some of the most skillful American workmen and successful inventors, having nothing to do at home, are employed by them.

The Italian Government has the largest and most powerful guns in the world to-day, and a few of the most formidable iron-clad ships afloat. Several guns, each of one hundred tons' weight, were made at the works of Sir William Armstrong. The guns of the iron-clad Italian ship Duilio will pierce twenty-two inches of solid iron at a distance of 2,000 yards. By this armament Italy becomes at one bound worthy of the rank, prowess, and renown of ancient Rome along the blue sea.

The British iron-clad Inflexible carries guns that will do the same work as the Duilio's. The Inflexible carries four of eighty tons' weight each, throwing a projectile weighing nearly a ton.

If complications, at any time possible, should arise between the United States and any foreign naval power, great or small, what could we do except to submit if we were unable to resist an attack on the seacoast or the sea?

Torpedoes are useful for defense, and I am glad to see that the committee have appropriated something for the possible conflicts under water; but torpedoes, to be useful, must be protected by guns. For assault they are useless. Whether or not they would, if operated on a large scale, prove a safe and reliable instrument of warfare within the limit claimed for them, is not yet a settled question. Who that is intelligent doubts that the method of destroying torpedoes is perfectly understood by naval and engineer officers of all nations? (See page 5, report of United States Engineers for 1879.)

River and harbor improvements are regarded as expedient and important, but if our coast and the entrance to our great rivers and harbors are not protected, internal improvements will not amount to much.

The maximum of iron plating for ships having been reached, and the guns that will pierce the heaviest armor that a ship will float having been made and proved to be sufficient, what is to be gained by waiting, at great risk, to see if other improvements are to be introduced, when we are sure that we are already very far behind all foreign naval powers in respect to both ships and guns? I am thinking only of defensive war now. Preparations for offensive war need not of necessity be hurriedly made.

The Spanish navy is much superior to ours in the number of vessels and their grade. It is made up of one hundred and forty-eight vessels of all classes, and eight hundred and nine guns, mostly rifles and heavy Rodman smooth-bores. Six of these ships are first-class iron-clad frigates, and seven others are of the second class of armored ships.

In our own Navy, according to the report of the Secretary, we have eighty-one ships of all classes; and to this number is to be added four monitors and eight tugs, which can be fitted for cruisers or torpedo-boats, making a total of ninety-three vessels that could in time be fitted for service.

We have not a sea-going iron-clad in our Navy. Monitors can not remain at sea, even if they could be kept afloat in all weather; they can not carry a supply of fuel for more than a few days and do not carry sail. Their turret ports are so near the water that in rough weather they could not be opened; and, more than all, an 8-inch rifle at sixty yards can riddle their turret plating in half an hour.

The piercing power of an 8-inch rifle is, theoretically, nine and eight-tenths inches at five hundred yards and nine and five-tenths at one thousand yards. A target of 11-inch laminated plates is equal in resistance to six inches of solid iron platings. Our monitors are covered with eleven inches of plates, each of one inch thickness, laid one over another, and at short range could not resist the 8-inch rifle of the Spanish navy, or any other, and would be destroyed by a gun of larger caliber at long range.

The cost of a steel gun is about double that of a cast-iron gun of equal dimensions, and, in the opinion of experts, the steel has not proved as good as the iron gun.

Krupp's steel guns have broken in several instances. Some years since a 10-inch cast-iron smooth-bore was tested to the utmost of its strength. It was loaded with an extra charge of powder and double shotted, and in various ways severely tried, and not until the tenth round, when the gun was filled nearly to the muzzle with powder, shot, and shell, was it broken. Of course such a test, in the legitimate use of any gun, would not be made.

Our one large rifle (12½-inch), now at Sandy Hook, cost about $28,000. This gun has proved the equal, if not the superior, of any gun of foreign manufacture of equal caliber. It throws a shot weighing from six hundred to seven hundred pounds. (See report of Chief of Ordnance for 1878, in which, for results, the American gun is pronounced "decidedly" superior to the Krupp and Italian guns, which use heavier charges than are required for ours to do the same work that they do.)

Herr Krupp, in response to a proposal from our officers to give a price for a 12-inch rifle, offered to manufacture and place on board ship for transportation a 12-inch rifle for the sum of $50,000 in gold, the conditions being that the gun should be tested under his own supervision. This is nearly double the cost of an American cast-iron gun of superior capacity and, as experience proves, equally safe and effective.

But it is doubtful if a steel gun can be made in this country. We lack the necessary machinery to do the work even if suitable metal were at hand. Nor is it in any respect important or desirable to substitute steel for iron in the fabrication of heavy ordnance even if the cost of material were the same in one case as in the other. Expert officers have demonstrated this fact over and over again, and no better authority than this can be found or is needed.

Whether guns should be made of steel or iron is a question for the responsible officers of the Government to determine and not one for interested parties outside to deal with. Upon such a subject one who is not an expert should defer to those who have given the best study of their lives to the technics belonging to this subject.

Because we have escaped the penalties of our indifference so many years, is no guarantee of such good fortune in the future. The property-owners of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and the coast cities generally, North and South, will hold somebody responsible for this perilous condition when the situation is thoroughly understood.

Economy, based upon the idea that we can afford to postpone the work of suitably equipping our fortifications until a crisis arises, may prove a delusion, and of course will, if we postpone action long enough.

If a foreign power desires to bring on a war with us, for any purpose whatever, the fact that we are helpless and unprepared will stimulate the motive to hunt for a pretext.

A government based upon the will of fifty millions of people, rich, prosperous, and abounding in resources, without the common means of defense of its honor and interests, presents a sorry spectacle to the world.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, a member of this House of my economic notions, yesterday expressed, both as to domestic frugality and foreign trade—loving and believing in the persuasive influences of free intercourse and reciprocal advantages—would naturally be disinclined to vote inordinate outlays for harbor defenses. He would prefer the cheap defense of fair customs duties and enlarged liberalities; but the millennium which ushers in his idealities has not yet begun to dawn, and he must consider contingencies of ominous aspect.

Am I told that there is no danger of a breaking out of hostilities with other countries, and therefore no need of making appropriations for the armament of our forts? The time has not yet come for the lion and the lamb to lie down together; the plowshare and pruning-hook are liable at any time to be converted into the bayonet and sword. The history of recent wars in Europe, Asia, and Africa is a lesson of warning to us. Our increasing trade and growing relations with other countries admonish us to be ready at least for defense, if not for aggression.

Think of our critical relations with Spain. How often in late years have we been on the verge of conflict with Spain! Her present commercial relations with us are a perpetual menace. Her tariff so discriminates against this country that it is almost robbery. When we consider our exports and imports to Cuba alone, the discrimination against us is so marked an evidence of selfishness and enmity that it is almost a casus belli. For five years, from 1872 to 1876, we bought of Cuba on an average each year goods to the value of $71,364,327, while we sold but $15,466,139. This leaves the enormous balance against us of $55,898,188. During these years we purchased of Cuba to the amount of $356,821,638, while Cuba only bought in all $77,330,690, leaving a trade balance against us of $279,490,940. During the past twenty years Cuban exports to the United States have increased at least 100 per cent. over our exports to Cuba, which have remained stationary. We have been Spain's best customer, especially in sugars. Yet how shabbily and meanly are we treated by her. The Spanish tariff favors her own vessels to such an extent as to deny to us advantages given other countries. Here is a statement of this rank injustice:

A barrel of flour of Spanish production imported in a Spanish vessel would pay a duty of $2.25.

The same flour imported in a foreign vessel would pay $4.50.

A barrel of flour of foreign production imported in a Spanish vessel from any country except the United States would pay $4.69½.

The same flour imported in a foreign vessel would pay $5.51.

The discrimination against the United States can be realized when it is understood that a barrel of flour imported thence direct, either in a Spanish or foreign vessel, would have to pay the last-named duty, while if it were sent to Canada and shipped from there it would be subject only to the third class, or $4.69½, if shipped under the Spanish flag. Or, in other words, flour shipped direct from the United States, even in a Spanish vessel, would pay 40 per cent. more than Canadian flour, or the same flour shipped by way of Canada, in a similar vessel.

Do you say that this kind of tariff will be ameliorated? Never while we are at the mercy of Spain's eight hundred rifled guns, her six first-class iron-clads, and her armored ships; never while the city of New York can be placed under these guns and exactions made by the hundred millions.

Is it not, therefore, wise and prudent to prepare, even by so small an appropriation, for the armament of our fortifications, that we may back our negotiations by proper force, and make our country respected for its position as a power on the earth?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MORSE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, the bill (H. R. 6370) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against persons charged with violation of the internal-revenue laws.

The message also announced that the Senate had returned, in accordance with the request of the House, the bill (H. R. 5682) to repeal section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1871, and to declare the forfeiture of the land grant therein made, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes, and had appointed Messrs. INGALLS, DAWES, and COKE managers at said conference on the part of the Senate.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York to reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has twenty minutes of the time of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FINERTY. Mr. Chairman, I return thanks to my ever generous and courteous friend from New York [Mr. COX] for the time he has allowed me, and hope that I shall not trespass upon the attention of the House beyond the limit of its patience.

I have listened, sir, with a great deal of attention to the remarks of my distinguished friend, and I must congratulate him and the House and the country on his partial conversion to the principles of national defense.

It would give me a great deal of pleasure to sustain the minority report as far as my humble capacity would allow me if I could do so conscientiously. But I believe the condition of our national defenses is at the present time in a state so depleted that it has become the duty of every patriot, irrespective of party consideration, to lift up his voice in favor of the majority recommendations that will give adequate defense to our exposed coasts and to our seaboard cities. I care not to what party the gentlemen may belong who favor this policy. It will always give me pleasure to sustain it. I believe that no gentleman in this House will say that at the present time our water and coast defenses are sufficient for the cruel emergency of a sudden war.

It is true, as has been said, that there is no enemy in sight. It is true that no enemy has positively declared against us; but we have no assurance as to how long it will be before an emergency shall arise in which we may be called upon to defend ourselves from the aggressions of some foreign power. Mr. Chairman, we have seen in our changeful climate the stars shine serenely at night, with no premonition of a storm; and yet before the morning came the tempest has been upon us, coming with the breath of desolation, leveling our homes, destroying valuable lives, and bringing poverty and ruin in its track.

But although it is true that when the storm passed away the stars were still in the heavens, even as they now shine upon our banner, still in that same uncertainty which governs political relations, as in the relations of nature, we are not assured that we are out of the pathway of martial tempests. And although our flag to-day is not confronted or threatened by a tangible enemy, we can not tell the time when, as in the past, the aggressive policy or the unmasked hatred of some foreign foe may menace its dignity and integrity. Then, sir, when the hour of peril comes can we apologize to the nation or apologize to posterity for the lack of defense of our seacoast, ay, the lack of defense of our very capital from the destruction of the foreign invader?

Mr. Chairman, we can not do so. Economy is a virtue all may practice; but the economy that proposes to leave this great country, free, independent, and prosperous as she now is, simply to the toleration of a foreign state ceases to be economy and becomes closely allied to treason. No matter what tempests may come, after they have consumed their fury the clouds will clear away and the stars in our banner will still blaze, the watchfires of the free, but with decent preparation we would not be called upon to lament the loss of many a gallant heart and the gloom of many a happy home.

The distinguished gentleman from Indiana, who is identified with economy in this House to an extent that has made his reputation national, said, in speaking of the naval appropriation bill, that a navy menaced the liberties of the people. I hope I do not misinterpret his remarks. I allude to the honorable gentleman, Judge HOLMAN. He said that a fleet menaced the liberties of the people; that it was always used for their suppression. I can not concur in that statement. History falsifies it. "From the blue waters of the Bay of Salamis" to the stormy waves of Lakes Erie and Champlain, from Themistocles down to Perry and McDonough and Farragut, the national fleet has ever been the guardian of the national honor, and has ever been the truest bulwark against the foreign foe. There is no evidence in history, and I challenge the gentleman to produce it if I say falsely, to show that the fleet of a nation has ever been the suppressor of its liberties. And even if that were so, the report of the minority of this committee is in conflict with the logic of events.

Although you may say the Navy is or may be used for the purpose of suppressing the people's liberties, I defy any gentleman present here or absent elsewhere to show me where the coast batteries erected to repel the foreign invader can be turned into a Prætorian guard to march into these Halls and enable some American Bonaparte to deluge these floors with the blood of the national representatives.

We are placed in a position where the eyes of the earth are upon us. We stand here a nation inferior to none in the resources that make a nation great. Yet we stand here saying in effect "we are at peace with everybody; we disclaim the use of arms; we are Quakers in spirit; we wear the petticoats of the Delawares, and concur in their base contentment as hewers of wood and drawers of water." Is this the warrior spirit of the nation that smote the crown and broke the mace of King George? Is this the spirit of the nation that refused the claim of search upon the seas, and fought for and maintained its dignity? Is this the spirit of the nation that, amidst overwhelming obstacles, carried that immortal flag (pointing to the Stars and Stripes over the Speaker's chair) through the defiles of Mexico to the Halls of Montezuma and planted it above those heroic halls in victory and in glory? [Applause.] Have we fallen on evil days that the land of Washington is no longer the arbiter of the western world?

Sir, I abhor this spirit of economy practiced to the extent of niggardliness. It not alone imperils, but it degrades the glory and the patriotism of the nation. It places us in the light of men who are afraid of our own chief officers. I hear it whispered that the money we may appropriate will be devoted to other objects than those for which it may be voted.

Sir, I have too high an opinion of the American Government to suppose that it would play a game of confidence. I have too high an opinion of the American Government to suppose it would ask from this House money under false pretenses. And I say that any party that is afraid of the expenditure of a few million dollars to maintain the security of the people, that is afraid to vote the money for fear it might go to a mercenary band that would be degraded by the acceptance of the bribe—I say here boldly as an American, independent of all parties, that if any party is so suspicious, so cowardly as that, it deserves to be beaten at the polls. The people will pass that sentence.

Mr. Chairman, I call up in evidence of the necessity of national defense, not desiring to intrude more copiously upon your patience, the testimony of one of the greatest soldiers of modern times, the Anglo-Irish conquerer of the modern Cæsar, the victor of Waterloo. Writing to General Burgoyne in 1847, when he was in the winter of his old age but still in the flower of his genius, speaking of the haughty power of England, then threatened by the jealousy of Louis Philippe, he wrote something that I could almost say was written for this day and for this country. I will give the extract. Said the Duke of Wellington:

> I am accustomed to the consideration of these questions [national defenses], and have examined and reconnoitered our whole coast from North Foreland, by Dover, Folkestone, Beachy Head, Brighton, Arundel to Selsea-bill, near Portsmouth, and I say that, excepting immediately under the fire of Dover Castle, there is not a point on the coast on which infantry might not be landed in any weather and with any state of the tide, and from which such body of infantry so thrown on shore would not find within five miles a road to the interior of the country through the cliffs practicable for the march of a body of troops; that in that space of coast there are no less than seven small harbors or mouths of rivers, each without defense, of which an enemy having landed his infantry on the coast might take possession and therein land his cavalry and artillery of all calibers and establish himself and his communications with France.
>
> When [continues the Duke] did any man hear of the allies of a country unable to defend itself? Views of economy of some, and I admit the high views of national finance of others, induce them to postpone those measures absolutely necessary for mere defense and safety, under existing circumstances, forgetting altogether the common practice of successful armies in modern times imposing upon the conquered people enormous pecuniary contributions and other penalties.
> Look at the course pursued by France in Italy and in Prussia, at Vienna repeatedly, at Berlin, at Moscow, the contributions levied, besides the subsistence, maintenance, clothing and equipment of the army that made the conquest! Look, also, at the conduct of the allied army which invaded France and had possession of Paris in 1815!

Sir, had the Duke of Wellington lived until 1870 he might have added, "Look at the enormous contribution levied by Germany on France after Sedan and Metz." If we think no foreign enemy would deal with us in any such exacting mood, let us look at that grim picture and remember that by the testimony of the engineer officers of the United States, by the statements of some of those officers published in the Washington Post of last Saturday, from here to the Chesapeake, and from the Chesapeake to the ocean, this Capitol is without defense—is at the mercy of any enemy that may choose to attack these United States.

You may say the conditions of Europe are impossible to America. But these very streets we look upon have heard the cannon of Bladensburg. They have beheld the bayonets of General Ross. History repeats itself. It is bound to do so again. It may come upon us as a thunderclap. And, for one, I do not desire to be identified, within or without partisan boundaries, with any party that squarely sets its face against the defense of our country from the probable insult or the possible invasion of a foreign enemy. [Loud applause.]

I say, gentlemen of this House, that this business is as much yours, perhaps more, than it is mine. I did not have the honor of being born here, but, not having had that honor, I appreciate the liberties and the glories of America all the more.

I do not speak to gratify any foreign spite. I have quoted to you, not through love but through necessity, the warning words of the most eminent of Irish generals and of British mercenaries, the Duke of Wellington. I have quoted to you his warning words to England in 1847. There were those who then laughed at the prudence of his wisdom, but who in 1859 acknowledged its worth when Napoleon III, as history has proven, meditated the realization of the dream of his illustrious uncle, the recreation of the army of Boulogne and the landing on the cliffs of Dover of another grand army to carry the eagles of France to the heart of London.

Then the voiceless lips of Wellington from his tomb in St. Paul's appealed to the British nation, which God knows I do not love, but which I admire for its pluck and its patriotism. They appealed to the British nation to construct its coast defenses; and notwithstanding the supremacy of the English fleet, notwithstanding the overweening national vanity, notwithstanding the overwhelming nature of that armament which holds the world in awe on the point of invasion, to-day from John O'Groat's to Lizard Point, all around the coast of England and of Scotland, from the Orkneys to the Channel Islands, bristle the cannon of England to defend her soil from invasion.

To you, gentlemen of America, you the representatives of this great and gallant nation, which has turned its back upon no foe, and which has ever been victorious, you of the gallant South and you of the independent and sturdy North, this is not a party question; it is a question of the whole nation, not alone of the North or south of the Ohio, or of the East or west of the Mississippi, but of all America. Let us close our ranks here in this Hall and give the people of this country the assurance that in this Chamber there sits a patriotic and not a partisan assembly.

Let us vote the appropriations recommended by the majority of the committee. Let us place our coast in a state of defense, so that with the free hearts of the country behind it we can say to the powers of Europe, "Come on, and you will find, as the Persians found in Greece, that every yard of our soil shall be the grave of a hero or an invader; that every spot of this soil shall be held sacred to liberty, and the American armies, with the chance to do battle such as freemen should have, will again prove their supremacy in the sunlight of liberty and place that flag in triumph and in glory above the wrecks of any empire that may dare to pollute our soil with the foul tread of its mercenary hosts." [Continued applause.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole have listened no doubt with pleasure to the eloquent words of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY]. There may have been occasions in the earlier years of our history when such words so admirably delivered would have touched the heart not only of this House but of the American people, for, sir, they were eloquent and patriotic words.

But the gentleman from Illinois has chosen an unfavorable period in which to reach the public heart by even eloquent words touching the public safety. The condition of our affairs at this time and the condition of the world does not justify the extraordinary spectacle, extraordinary in view of our past experience and our relations to the other portions of the globe, that is presented this afternoon on this floor. I fear that it is not always that the American statesman is able to comprehend the greatness of his own country and its commanding relations to the rest of the world. Yet there have been times when every American citizen was aroused and anxious for the safeguards and strongholds on which rested the security of our shores. Then such eloquent appeals as we have listened to would have had force and meaning, but happily the occasion has gone by. The history of that period has already been written.

This discussion, I repeat, is the more unusual, Mr. Chairman, because of the time in which it has occurred. When we were comparatively a feeble people expressions drawn from a sense of danger and of national peril were becoming in a statesman, and to sound the note of alarm on the appearance of danger, ever so remote; well became a patriot, and the Republic would have paused to listen. Had speeches such as those delivered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] been delivered in this House forty years ago when the Republic was not fully conscious of its strength, when unsettled boundaries provoked disputes, when other nations towered above us in strength and resources, in number of men who could be marshaled in arms, and perhaps in the moral power of established institutions and national character, then it seems to me speeches like these might have been appropriate in the American Congress.

But when it is apparent that we stand to-day, not only in our own estimation—and the American people have not been unseemly forward in the assertion of the relative standing of their Government—but in the common judgment of the statesmen of the world, however slow to admit the greatness of a republic, the foremost among nations, not only in the triumphant success of our free institutions, but in commanding resources, and the numbers, intelligence, union, and manhood of our people—when such facts are considered, together with the fact of our remarkable geographical position, the great oceans our barriers against hostile intrusion, then it is, indeed, astonishing that appeals for national security based upon fancied apprehensions of danger should be indulged in on this floor. Does the manhood we represent indulge in this sentiment of unseemly caution?

What has been our experience in years past? It has not been the expenditure of vast sums of money for the purpose of protecting our shores from invasion. The feeblest government on the face of Europe, the feeblest of them all, has, during the hundred years of our national existence, expended more treasure—the toil of its people—for defense against hostile force than has been expended by this Government from the beginning.

Indeed, sir, my friend from Illinois, when following the example of the gentleman from Michigan, would unconsciously introduce into our politics the theories of European government, he forgets that when this Government of ours was organized it left behind it the traditions of the past and the institutions of the European government. If it had not done so the greatness of this nation would not have been achieved. Our fathers left behind them the institutions of the Middle Ages. They left behind them as things of the past the ideas of great armies and navies, the idea that the parade of vast physical power was indispensable to the security of a people against foreign aggression. They left behind them every such tradition, and on this new theater of human aspirations could do so with safety.

Our isolated position gave us ample security against foreign invasion. We derived still greater security from the nature of our institutions of government. We were entering upon a new career, then unknown to the governments of the world, in which the object of government should be not power or conquest or aggression, not wars of ambition to gratify the petty pride and ambition of a ruler, but the manhood and elevation of all men. To establish a nation of freemen was the purpose of the new era. In departing forever from the European policy of conquest, injustice, and ambition we were secure from the beginning. Our fathers felt at the outset that there were stronger barriers and fortresses of defense than fortifications upon the seaboard; stronger armament than armies or navies or fortified posts; stronger than ingenuity, skill, and labor of man could devise—a free and intelligent people, conscious of their manhood, a government with no motive for injustice or oppression.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman will allow me an inquiry. If that was the view of our fathers why did they proceed straightway to make fortifications?

Mr. HOLMAN. Here and there with that prudence which became a Government comparatively feeble, and with no considerable outlay, our fathers proceeded to fortify some important harbors at the beginning. They were conscious, however, that with our extended coast, reaching upon the Atlantic from Maine to the Gulf, and with our vast lake frontier, any such system of fortifications as would give us as security upon the European idea would be in the nature of things impossible.

But, sir, coming down to a recent period, the late war taught the American people some valuable lessons. We had learned them in part in the war of 1812; and we learned them freshly during the late war. In looking over our appropriation bills I find our appropriations for fortifications in the years immediately following the late war were embodied in just two lines——

For the preservation of fortifications $200,000 is hereby appropriated.

How did it happen that immediately after the war period, when even yet were smouldering the fires which England and France, backed by other European powers, had enkindled on our shores by the invasion of a neighboring republic, with all the events of the late war fresh in our minds, why was it deemed unnecessary to appropriate more than $200,000 for the purpose of perfecting our coast?

Mr. ELLIS. Does the gentleman wish an answer?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ELLIS. It was because in 1860 the United States, so far as our coasts and cities were concerned, was regarded as the best fortified nation in the world, having larger guns and better forts; and because immediately after the war the science of long-range guns and heavy projectiles had not so completely revolutionized naval warfare as has happened since.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; the American people have been taught by that war that expensive fortifications erected upon so comparatively narrow a channel as the Mississippi River where invading ships were, within range of an ordinary gun were absolutely without value. The earthwork and the sand bank thrown up on the spur of the hour was found the real fortress when the hour of action came.

The real fortifications or defensive agencies of the war were improvised upon the spur of the occasion, and the vast outlay which had occurred from year to year in the purchase of ordnance, together with the comparatively small sum expended upon forts, was absolutely a waste of money; for when the late war was upon us, after years of appropriations of treasure for ordnance, arms, and military supplies, they were thrown upon the market and sold as worthless and condemned material. The agencies for conducting the war were the outgrowth of the hour. Here in the Federal capital and in other cities of the Union the very munitions of war which we had gathered together in former years were exposed in the market and sold, and the new appliances requisite for a great army sprang up on the moment.

It was discovered that fortifications such as had been built with great care and skill at an early period on the Lower Mississippi did not even stop the headway of the ordinary wooden ship. It was very strange that we had not learned that lesson when the war of 1812 came upon us. Our fathers were fully admonished of its coming; for a government situated like ours, a country geographically placed like ours, can not in the very nature of things be precipitated into war. Our fathers foresaw the coming of that contest, yet with the courage and self-reliance of a people capable of their own government, incurring no extraordinary expenditures, they prepared to meet the event when it came with strong hearts and manly purpose. And how well they met it, how improvised navies and armies sprang up at the call of patriotism, is one of the proudest events of our history.

The history of the period preceding the war of 1812 shows no such speeches as have been delivered on this floor—no such apprehension of coming danger, although the clouds were gathering—no such trembling in the presence of fancied terrors. Why, sir, that famous navy which drove our great antagonist of that hour from the lakes of the North and achieved one of the most glorious victories of that or any other time was the outgrowth of an hour, an improvised navy—improvised as it were from the first, in a period so brief as less than three months.

Yet with this experience we are told that in a time of profound peace we shall ingraft upon American politics the theory of a commanding military establishment. The experience of Europe is appealed to, and the practices of European governments, which are prepared for war at any moment, are commended to us, forgetting our position on the face of this globe—the origin, the theory, and purpose of our Government, forgetting that a beneficent Providence has placed our country in a position of unexampled security, undoubtedly to the end that the grand experiment of a government of the people might find its complete development, which great armies and navies and military establishments as institutions of Government would have rendered impossible.

What nation are the gentlemen fearful will seek a contest with the American Republic and measure swords with the American people? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] refers to a great power from whence sprung the American colonies, twice driven from our shores by the Republic in its infancy. Does he not know that no people ever held such a hostage for the good conduct of a nation as the people of the United States hold against that power in that vast and valuable dominion extending from one ocean to the other north of the great lakes?

Mr. EATON. Another thing: their spinners could not live without our cotton and they could not live without our breadstuffs.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; all these are pledges and guarantees of peace. Who, gentlemen, are your common carriers? Who are the common carriers of the commerce of the world? The American people are not inclined to underrate their commerce. The common carriers of the world are those who are able and willing to carry the cheapest, and the common carriers of the commerce of the world are not your capitalists, are not your people.

The commercial powers who control the carrying trade of the world are your common carriers, the carriers of your vast commerce. Whose ships and commerce are to be driven from the ocean by the privateers boldly, as of old, issuing from every American port in the event peace shall be broken by any of the nations of the earth having ships to cross the ocean—the peace which involves your security and safety? Not your commerce, not your ships, not your carrying trade, but those of those very nations of whom gentlemen profess to stand in such apprehension of their approaching with hostile purpose your shores! You hold the commerce of the world as a bond for the peace of the world. You hold in your hands an empire as a pledge and guarantee of peace, and as well as the vast commercial navy of the greatest of the maritime powers. No nation since governments were organized by mankind has held such guaranties for peace as we hold against the whole world.

See on the borders of the Caribbean Sea what hostages you hold for the good conduct of the European powers toward your nation. Yes, sir; God in his infinite mercy has placed the American people in a position where they could fully develop the idea upon which alone free institutions can rest—the just equality of man; the freedom, intelligence, and manhood of mankind. But gentlemen, in apparent paroxysm of fear, would ingraft upon your free institutions theories which your fathers dreamed had been left behind forever. Military establishments! The methods of government which have wrung from labor the cry of despair from the beginning. Is it certain for what purpose these fortifications are to be built? Are gentlemen certain that this attempt to enter upon this military establishment, on pretense of national safety, is not suggested by others with different motives from those which inspire them? What did the crafty and subtle ruler of the French build fortifications around the French capital for? The patriotic announcement was that they were to repel the public enemy. History tells you, however, it was to protect the imperial power from the indignation of the people.

No, sir; I think no American citizen can listen with composure when he hears this appeal for a great navy and an enlarged military establishment. The movement for a great army is more in the background—this appeal for great military appropriations, for the construction of forts and the forging of guns, and the perfection of ordnance in this time of profound peace. When we consider the peaceful condition of the world and the absolute security for peace we possess we may well apprehend that the true motive has not been spoken. The extraordinary display of anxiety for increased military resources seems to be more distinct in this Congress than at any former time. Do not gentlemen perceive that all these movements tend to investing our Government with power not of the people? Does it not mean a strong and brilliant Government to supplant the old-time simplicity of our institutions?

And when we shall have entered upon the career of so-called broad and liberal statesmanship which gentlemen long for, of splendid government, will it require a prophet to foretell when the days of republican government will be numbered?

These fortifications are to be built in the vicinity of your great cities; sir, against whom are they to be directed? When you consider the position of the United States, its peaceful relations with the whole world, its absolute freedom from any entangling alliance with foreign governments, the absence of any aggressive purpose, the relations of its commerce to the general interests of mankind, the absence of even unfriendly relations with any other government, the absolute absence of motive for injustice on our part to any nation—when these things are considered the American people certainly can not sympathize with the extraordinary efforts made in the present Congress to create a great navy, or make large appropriations for pretended national defense; for well may they apprehend a purpose far more sinister than appears on the face of these measures.

Mr. Chairman, the appropriations for the present fiscal year for the purpose of national defenses are over $400,000 in excess of what they were during the year 1878 and later years succeeding the war, when we were legislating with direct reference to events which had just occurred. We are proposing to appropriate by this bill within a small amount of the same sum that was appropriated for the present fiscal year. Five hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars is the sum which the minority of this committee, the majority of the Democratic members of the committee, recommend. They propose an appropriation of that sum this year. For the protection, preservation, and repair of forts, $175,000, the same sum as was appropriated for this year. I think it is but a part of reasonable prudence that these fortifications now held and owned by you, the ground upon which they stand having been generally improved, should be still subject to national care and protection, and I believe that no one will object to the appropriation of $175,000 for that purpose. That is all that is required.

Mr. ELLIS. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me to interrupt him, I would like him to tell the committee right now and here and in this connection why he wants to preserve any single fort over which the United States flag floats. What possible object have you in view and why do you want to preserve them?

A MEMBER. For ornament.

Mr. HOLMAN. One gentleman suggests for mere ornament. I do not adopt that idea, however.

Mr. ELLIS. I think that is a better reason than any you have given.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would preserve them for any emergency that might by human possibility arise; and yet it is almost absolutely certain, in the light of the past and in the light that the past throws on the future, that in the event of a war with any nation these fortifications would never be brought into use.

Mr. GIBSON. They may be used for storehouses, I suppose?

Mr. HOLMAN. And I think I heard a gentleman suggest within the last few months that all of the material gathered together there in these fortifications, the antiquated arms—guns constructed five years ago are antiquated now—should be gathered together, and that this expense of $175,000 even should be avoided. I think the gentleman from Louisiana heard that speech made.

Mr. ELLIS. In another part of your bill you propose to sell them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Louisiana heard that speech as to the abandonment of these forts that were shown to be useless in virtue of the changed condition of military affairs; and from the improved appliances through which military operations are carried on it was suggested that all of these old implements of war should be gathered together and the expense even of keeping them and holding the forts need not be sustained. And I heard the gentleman make no objection to that suggestion at that time. I am not certain that my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] did not make that speech himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIS. And he indorses it now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then $175,000, according to the practice of recent years, is appropriated for the purpose of keeping up, as far as may be necessary, the present fortifications. You will never use them.

Mr. HORR. Then why keep them up?

Mr. HOLMAN. If used at all, it will be in all human probability only in connection with the torpedo system of coast defenses. Certainly I can not suppose, in view of the changes in modern arms, that they would be of any use for the purpose of harbor defenses, but, as in your experience in the late war, you will never in any event use these forts for national defense, but you will never use them, no occasion will occur—you would have to change the geography of the globe—the geography of the earth itself—to find any reason or any just pretense for these appeals to Congress to appropriate millions of money to erect barriers against a foreign foe.

In the event of a contest coming every gentleman who has considered the subject must understand that the torpedo system now being developed with unexampled ingenuity and skill will be the system to depend upon for the protection of our harbors in the future. But, sir, our harbors are in no danger or peril. No voice comes up from the masses of the people or from the populous cities asking Congress to expend large sums for the erection of fortifications. The people themselves are not indulging these apprehensions. But if the apprehensions shall come, if they shall ever have any foundation in fact, the safety of the ports of our country will depend upon other means than the fortified posts.

For the purchase of torpedoes in their various forms, including submarine mines, and for improvements and tests of motors for movable torpedoes, we propose $100,000—a larger sum, I believe, than it has ever been customary heretofore to place in the bill. That, as gentlemen will perceive, is simply for experiments——

Mr. ELLIS. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. For what other purposes do you want it, then? Is it desirable to purchase and lay aside supplies of torpedoes which in all probability within six months or within a year hence may be superseded by other skillful inventions in that line? One hundred thousand dollars for experiments—and in view of the operations of the past and of the possibilities of the future, the expenditure of $100,000 to encourage and multiply inventive skill which has brought the torpedo to its present high perfection—to perfect it further would seem to be a proper appropriation, and there would be no objection to a proposition of that kind; but no larger sum can be expended to any possible advantage.

The next item of the minority bill is for the armament of our seacoast defenses, including the manufacture and conversion of heavy guns, an amount of $320,000 is suggested, including an item of $20,000 for machine-guns. And yet we must see, sir, in the future as in the past, the expenditures incurred will be simply yielding to that sentiment of excessive caution which some gentlemen indulge in for national defenses; for the very ordnance you construct will be superseded and sold as worthless iron, even if a war should occur ten years hence.

Mr. ELLIS. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana I would say we all want information, and I would like the gentleman to stop and tell the House what he proposes to do with that $300,000; what sort of guns he proposes to have, and how he expects to construct them?

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been supposed our engineers are thoroughly informed and well skilled in whatever pertains to guns and arms. We trust them entirely. I am not defending the item.

Mr. ELLIS. But the gentleman signs a report in which it is proposed to appropriate this sum. I want him to tell the House what he is going to do with it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to place it under the control of the engineers, to use it as they may think proper in the preparation of arms. I propose to do with that $300,000 just what we do with the $100,000 for torpedoes. These are experiments; nothing more, nothing less. You could not allow other nations of the globe to proceed alone in sending expeditions to the North Pole; for the sentiment here and elsewhere was that even in matters of enterprise like that you should keep abreast with the nations of the world. So in this matter of experimenting in munitions of war; nothing more.

Here, in the matter of arms and military establishments, we are but imitating the bad example which is given in Europe by the petty ambition and pride of men in power supporting kingly authority. It is but a feeble imitation. There is nothing to excite our pride in it. There is nothing to excite our pride in a single item of either of those bills. It is but a feeble imitation of the policy of nations against whose breaking the peace toward us we hold such guarantees as no nation, ancient or modern, ever held. For since the creation of this earth and the formation of human society no people have been so completely exempt from the peril of attack by any foreign power as ours have controlled by the principle which has come down to us by tradition from our fathers of justice to all men. There is no occasion for us to imitate feebly or otherwise what gentlemen call the effete monarchies of Europe. The moral power that springs from a nation of freemen too conscious of their greatness to be unjust is a better guaranty of safety than statesmanship had ever devised or ever will.

We appropriate, then, for all these purposes $595,000. Gentlemen, in the name of the people, would you in a feeble way imitate here upon the soil of America the practices which have grown up in Europe under institutions that have ground the masses to the earth during long centuries? You may look in vain through all the statute-books of a hundred years for the indication of any deliberate purpose upon the part of American statesmen to ingraft the institutions of Europe upon ours.

Why should we have a great Navy and preparations for war, accustoming our people to the force and idea of military power? Who will suffer by all this? Who suffered in Europe? Against whom and to keep whom in subjection are the great armaments of the Old World employed? It is mainly to keep their own people in subjection; more indirectly to defend themselves against the common grasping ambition by which the kingly governments of Europe are disturbed. England has for centuries oppressed her people with wretched poverty to keep up her military power.

No, sir; there is no excuse, there is no possible justification or excuse, for taking from the people of the United States their hard earnings, drawn through countless channels into your Treasury, for the purpose of imitating institutions which in all the past have produced the woe and agony of mankind.

The bill reported by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] on behalf of the majority of the committee, proposes to appropriate a million of dollars for fortifications at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, and San Francisco. I know that no gentleman from California will thank you for putting the city last mentioned in your bill. In so far as concerns the beautiful city at the Golden Gate no one supposes either of the forts at either side of that famous gate is necessary for the protection of that beautiful bay from the encroachment of an enemy. Ten years ago, in the imperfect condition of your torpedo system, no ingenuity could have devised a mode of meeting that form of defensive war which could have rendered that port accessible to an enemy on any conceivable condition. You built a fort there, I admit, shortly after you acquired the Pacific coast. You have an unfinished fort on the north side of the gate. You know that neither of those forts can ever be brought into requisition, can ever be used for the purpose of protecting the bay of San Francisco from an advancing enemy. A million of dollars is appropriated for these forts. All the other important forts are left subject to the comparitively unimportant item of $300,000. Provision is only made for these populous cities where already millions of dollars have been expended; for most of the appropriations made in former years have been expended in special localities, with no general system of defense.

But then the torpedo system is not overlooked. For that an appropriation of $170,000 is made. Who is to expend that money? I would ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS]. He will answer me as I have answered him—the engineer.

Mr. ELLIS. Does the gentleman want me to reply to him now?

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill proposes for the armament of seacoast fortifications, $600,000, and for steel guns, $1,000,000. The bill covers for all these purposes for the coming year alone $3,070,000. Then it is provided that there shall be a million dollars appropriated each year for five years from the 1st day of next month—that is, from to-morrow—for the purpose of national defense in the way of steel guns.

Mr. Chairman, I trust I will have at least for a moment on this point the ear of this committee. For now eight years the Democratic party of this House when in the majority have been struggling to create some responsibility on the part of your Executive Departments to the action of Congress to limit the public expenditures to the sums which Congress from year to year might appropriate.

Your Constitution unhappily, as I think, has limited the appropriation of public money by only the one provision, that for the purpose of supporting an army you can not appropriate beyond two years. But you are proposing here for military purposes to appropriate a million of dollars a year for a period of five years. This very House within the last month took a long step toward compelling the appropriation of nearly the entire sums of money to carry on your Government by annual appropriations, except on account of your public debt. Yet with this radical democratic idea that the appropriation of money should be made only so that there should be a proper responsibility on the part of the Executive Departments, it is now proposed to adopt the proposition reported from the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate for military purposes $1,000,000 a year for the period of five years from to-morrow and leave it under the absolute control of the War Department.

For what purpose is this permanent appropriation to be made? Afraid of whom? It is that if this bill should pass with this continuing appropriation, and at the very next session of Congress this House, coming fresh from the people again, might seek to repeal that provision, it would be met by another branch of this Government with its unqualified negative. That, then, is the purpose of the appropriation of $1,000,000 annually for the period of five years from July 1, 1884. You would place $5,000,000 at least beyond the control of this House, which most directly represents the people.

The people have not been consulted on this measure. The courage and manhood of the American people have not been consulted. The timidity which has displayed itself, the apparent apprehension of danger in the future is not borne in the hearts of the people we represent. As in the past generations, so in the present, the American people rely upon themselves and their own resources and manhood to meet an emergency when it shall come. They see nothing to indicate a disturbance of the peace and repose of this nation. They see no indication that the food shall be taken from the mouth of labor to gratify the insatiate ambition of any man or any body of men. They see no cause of apprehension that this nation, standing now first in the rank of nations, will do any such act of injustice as will involve them in strife. They know with their consent it will not be done. They know that a Government which stands as ours in the light of all the nations of the earth, controlled by the sentiment of justice and honor, with no plans of conquest and no motive for injustices is not likely to be assailed, and when assailed millions of strong arms are ready for its defense. [Applause.]

Mr. FOLLETT. During the hundred years of the life of this nation we have had but one war with an enemy that has sought our shores, and that war was but the conclusion of the original struggle which resulted in our independence. At no time in the history of this country has any one been apprehensive of a foreign enemy, or of an attack from abroad, or that we as a nation would meet any insult.

It was not until recently, and so far as I know not until this Congress, that the alarm has been sounded that the nation is defenseless and that large sums of money should be expended for the purpose of providing against a contingency which no one sees in the future, which is simply a chimera, and which judging the future by the past would be a useless and unnecessary expenditure of money.

During the entire history of this country there have been men who have apprehended danger and have been constantly sounding the alarm and anxious for large standing armies and large expenditure for defensive purposes. But to-day we have a standing army of 25,000 men only, and nobody loses sleep on that account. Yet we are continually reminded that the nations of Europe have adopted a different policy, and, therefore, America should follow in their footsteps.

The nations of Europe have adopted a different policy. As against our army of 25,000 men Germany presents hers of 600,000, France her army of half a million, and England her army of 400,000, and the people of those countries are taxed for their support. But not one of those standing armies are kept in the field for the purpose of attacking a Government whose strength rests in the hearts of the people as it does in the United States. They are sitting there watching each other, apprehensive of each other, lying contiguous to each other, and fearful each of an attack from the other. But who in this House, what member of Congress, believes that either one of those nations contemplates or dares to attack the United States.

If we are to arm our thousands of miles of seacoast, if we are to provide steel guns of the character which gentlemen speak of for all of our seaports, if we are to incur that expenditure in this time of profound peace for the purpose of being prepared for war, as they say, for an attack from foreign nations, then you will not stop after this year with an appropriation of $3,000,000, but on the contrary you will have to increase it tenfold from year to year. The appropriations in this bill are but the entering-wedge. The bill is drawn upon the idea that if you incur an expenditure of $3,000,000 this year you will be willing hereafter for the purpose of saving that amount to incur larger expenditures in future years.

We are advised that this is an age of invention, that implements of war, implements for the destruction of human life, have strangely and greatly changed ever since the closing of the war of the rebellion in 1865; and that is true. This inventive spirit is now not only bringing forth new implements of war, new cannon, new ordnance, new explosives, but everything that pertains to the destruction of human life or the defense of coasts and harbors is now simply undergoing a process of renovation and change. No nation has yet discovered a material that is safe, or entirely safe, at least, for the manufacture of large ordnance. Experiments, as shown in the report of the minority of the Committee on Appropriations, are still in embryo, and we are waiting for the inventive genius of our people and of other nations of the world to produce something that will stand the test. Until that is done, money can not be expended intelligently or properly for the purpose of supplying ordnance of this character.

Mr. ELLIS. Has the gentleman read the report of the gun-foundery board?

Mr. FOLLETT. I have not.

Mr. ELLIS. I thought so. That is all.

Mr. FOLLETT. I have not read that report; but I undertake to say that no gun of large caliber has yet been tested by what can be denominated properly a battle test that has been found to be entirely reliable for the discharge and propelling of the kind of shell or shot that gentlemen speak of as being so effective.

Mr. ELLIS. Did the gentleman read the story of the bombardment of Alexandria by the British fleet?

Mr. FOLLETT. I did.

Mr. ELLIS. Then the gentleman is answered.

Mr. FOLLETT. I did read the account of that bombardment, and I have read the story of tests made in England and this country since that time, of this kind of ordnance, and these tests have shown it was not what it was represented to be.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman refer me to that report.

Mr. FOLLETT. I was reading in a newspaper only a day or two ago of a test recently made where the gun supposed to be one of reliable pattern exploded. We have here in the minority report a reference to what is stated upon that subject by one of our own ordnance officers, a man who understands what he talks about.

Mr. ELLIS. Who is that?

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. William P. Hunt.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes. He is a contractor.

Mr. RANDALL. He is president of the South Boston Iron Company, is a party interested in this matter, and a man of great experience.

Mr. FOLLETT. He is a man who probably has had as much experience on this subject as anybody.

Mr. ELLIS. What is the date of that report?

Mr. FOLLETT. Eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

Mr. ELLIS. Three years ago.

Mr. FOLLETT. It will be three years in November. But, sir, whether these experiments have been successfully made or not, the question arises what is the necessity that should compel us to expend money without waiting until these tests should be made, so as to be entirely satisfactory, before we invest money for the purpose of supplying this Government with that class of ordnance?

The most effective weapon for harbor defense, as already stated, is the torpedo; and the minority of the committee have reported in favor of an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of supplying at least one movable torpedo, and testing also the motive power by which it can be successfully managed.

Mr. ELLIS. With the gentleman's permission, I would like to read right here four lines and a half from Admiral Porter on this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. FOLLETT. The gentleman has before asked several questions. If he did not expect to make a speech on this subject I would not object to yielding to him.

Mr. ELLIS. But this comes in here so pertinently.

Mr. FOLLETT. I know; a great many things come in pertinently.

Mr. RANDALL. And some impertinently.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman would find this very pertinent. Admiral Porter says——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. FOLLETT. I will yield this time, but hereafter I prefer the gentleman should speak in his own time.

Mr. ELLIS. Admiral Porter says:

An insane idea seems to prevail that we can do without guns and ships, and that our harbors can be protected by torpedoes. There might be something in such an argument if we had forts that could keep out an enemy's fleet; but the party that can command the best ironclads and the heavist ordnance will win.

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. Speaker, if there were any reason whatever to apprehend an exigency in the near future—if there were any reason on earth to believe that the Government of the United States needs to provide for an immediate emergency—it might be well to go (even if we were obliged to go blindly) into the adoption of various devices and methods recommended by patentees, without subjecting them in the first instance to proper tests. But in a time of profound peace, when no exigency exists, and when we know the temper and resources and power which would be displayed by our people in case an exigency should arise, money spent for the purpose of making these experiments is money wasted.

The history of all wars in this and almost every other country has been, that in most instances the point specially prepared for defense against an enemy is not the point where a country will most likely be attacked. In other words, for the purpose of supplying our coast with complete defenses, you must not simply fortify Boston, New York, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, and San Francisco, but you will be obliged to fortify all the harbors and points where an enemy could be landed. Therefore, to start in upon the idea that the defenses of New York and Boston and Hampton Roads would protect our eastern coast, the defenses of San Francisco our western coast, and the defenses of New Orleans our southern coast, is to start in upon a mistaken notion.

Why, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] said the powers of Europe know our defenseless condition and how helpless we lie. They are careful, however, to respect that which is our greatest and surest defense and always will be—they are careful not to arouse the American people and develop their resources that in one year, one month if need be, could be called into action for the purpose of repelling any invader who should be so rash as to attempt to attack us.

And again, Mr. Chairman, one of our strongest means of defense is that the masses of the people in all the first-class powers of the world are in sympathy with the American people, and we will be the last nation against which they would attempt to make an attack, lest there should be a reaction at home more effective against them than either dynamite, torpedo, or big gun. [Applause.]

I do not believe there is a man on the floor of this House who has lost one moment's sleep during the whole period of his life because of any apprehension of attack upon this country from foreign powers. Nor do I believe that the humblest citizen or the wealthiest apprehends any such danger to it.

And why is it that just upon the verge, just upon the eve of a Presidential election a policy that was discarded by the last Congress, a policy which they refused to adopt, has now suddenly grown into importance, and the emergency has become so startling as gentlemen tell us it is to-day? Why, Mr. Chairman, no man believes that in our isolated condition, with no powers bordering on us, we need apprehend danger from the government to which the territory lying to our north belongs. That power will be one of the last to disturb our repose, for she knows the moment an attack should be made upon us that territory would cease to belong to her. We have no apprehension of danger from the South, and upon the East and West we are bordered by the ocean. And right there is where these gentlemen have been so suddenly aroused to our danger—danger of ironclads, danger of large vessels, danger that our cities would be shelled, that they would be destroyed or laid under contribution. I have mistaken Yankee energy, Yankee skill, Yankee inventive genius, if some method would not be devised to prevent, I care not what power or strength the vessel might be, from ever coming within shelling distance of New York should the emergency arise.

Wars do not spring up in a moment. National controversies do not arise in a year. Time is given for preparation. Time is given to enable us to be prepared to meet the attack before the attack would come. In any event the country would be ready, and its wealth, its power, its skill would be placed at the command and disposal of the Government at any moment to repel a foreign attack.

And to-day, sir, we stand in a better position than ever heretofore. The last sad contest we had was brother against brother, one section against the other, and should the occasion arise for an attack against a foreign enemy these two sections would vie with each other in the exhibition of their patriotism, the display of their courage in friendly intercourse against a hostile foe, for the purpose of showing that the nation is cemented by the blood of brethren into a nation inseparable and forever perpetual. [Great applause.]

And in view of this condition of things, I have no fear of any nation on the earth, even if we had not a gun or a ship upon the sea. When the proper time comes, when the proper plan of vessel is presented, I as a member of this Congress, when I know that the money we appropriate for that purpose is to be wisely expended, am ready to build up a navy and supply it with the means of asserting our power abroad. But at home I want no other power except the strong right arms and the brave hearts of the American people.

I ask for no standing army. The policy has been from the beginning of this Government we did not need it and we would not have it. We have never taxed our people for any such purpose beyond the mere skeleton around which the brave people of our country could rally in case of emergency.

I ask no forts. We can throw up if need be in one week earthworks that I believe would be as effective against guns of a large caliber as any fort that could be constructed, and I certainly would not by my vote make a permanent appropriation of $5,000,000 for the purpose of having the money expended by somebody in making guns that we know nothing about either as to their caliber and their efficiency. Subject them to test; test them under such commission as you may appoint, and who knows but that the next day or the next week some man of greater skill and of greater genius would produce a gun far its superior? If an emergency arises we have the markets of America at least if not the markets of the world to draw from for the supply of such arms as shall be most effective and efficient; and I am ready to trust to the skill and ingenuity and inventive genius of the American people against that of any or all other people combined.

There is now going on a test upon the powers of dynamite shells, and dynamite has been heard of not in this country merely but in other nations. Dynamite may possibly work out and solve problems that statesmanship has failed to solve heretofore. Dynamite is certainly in some parts of the world a terror to men who heretofore have known no terror. I am not saying whether it is right or wrong; but we do know as a means of destruction, as an explosive agency for the purpose of destroying human life, it is a mighty power and without a superior. If these tests shall work out satisfactorily and result practically, if the weapon used for the purpose of the propulsion of dynamite shells is satisfactory, we shall need, if an emergency arises, some of these guns. But the plant spoken of in the bill of the majority will never be necessary for any such purposes. The bill the minority have presented we believe to be ample. Gentlemen ask us, "What are you going to do with the money you appropriate?" They ask that with reference to an appropriation of $300,000, which is substantially the same as another appropriation for which the bill of the majority gives $600,000 for armament and the manufacture of heavy guns. Well if we can not use $300,000 I ask the gentleman from Louisiana what the majority of the committee are going to do with their appropriation of $600,000?

Mr. ELLIS. Let me answer now?

Mr. FOLLETT. In your own time.

I believe, sir, that the bill reported to the House by the minority is all the country wants, is all it requires, and all we ought to give at this time. And I believe still further that the people of this country with that amount would feel just as safe and secure as they would if the bill of the majority were passed. I do not believe there is any apprehension abroad that we are in danger of an attack; but while I subscribe fully to the sentiment "in time of peace prepare for war," I believe that can best be done by lightening the burdens of taxation upon the people, by developing our resources, by making the nation happy, and by attaching our people to the Government with sentiments of love; and then when the emergency does arise they will be ready to bring their resources and their lives if need be to lay them upon the altar of their country. [Applause.]

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, I have taken other occasion to express my opinion as to the danger which the country is incurring by reason of the present condition of our naval defenses. The United States have had a policy with reference to the maintenance of an army and navy and coast defenses which began with the first administration. The principle of that policy was stated by the first President to the first Congress in the following language:

To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace.

This statement of policy by Washington is in my judgment as true to-day as it was a hundred years ago. That national policy has been a small army with a large body of officers, trained to their professions in the most perfect manner; a small navy of the best quality, and a complete system of seacoast defenses. That policy was rigidly pursued by the Government of this country without reference to party changes, so that when, after nearly sixty years of Democratic administration, the Republican party came into power the fact was as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] has stated it, and the coast of the United States had the best defense of any coast in the world. The fortifications were on the greatest scale, and the armament was of the most approved description, far surpassing in power the armament of any other fortifications anywhere in the world.

I had occasion, I well remember, in 1855 to make an examination as to the relative condition at that time of the defenses of the city of New York, the principal fortress upon our coast, if I may use such a phrase, and the city in the Crimea, Sevastopol, before which the British forces were then gathering; and at that time the city of New York had a greater number of guns mounted upon its fortifications than Sevastopol had, while the guns were of such caliber that the fire from the forts of New York weighed nearly double that from the forts at Sevastopol.

And yet the fortifications of the Crimean city were sufficiently strong to resist the attacks of the most powerful maritime power in the world. At that time such was the relation of ships to fortifications that forts as well built and as well armed as those of Sevastopol were sufficient to resist the attacks of England's fleets.

Therefore I say to this House that as the result of sixty years—or with but slight interruptions—of Democratic policy our cities were well defended and able to resist any fleets then known to maritime warfare. What I have described was the result of a national policy which favored a good army, a good navy, and a complete and perfect system of coast fortifications.

But what is our present situation? No one doubts at all that it is within the power of several European nations to bombard every city upon the Atlantic seacoast. And not only that, no person who chooses to inform himself can doubt that Buffalo and Cleveland and Detroit and Milwaukee and Chicago are as completely at the mercy of at least one European power as are New York and Philadelphia. And not only are the harbors upon the seacoast and the harbors upon the lakes defenseless, but even the Mississippi River lies open and is deep enough to float the heaviest battle-ship up to Natchez. Is it satisfactory to us that we should continue in this condition?

People say, Why is this question a pressing one now when it was not pressing a year ago? It was a pressing question a year ago. It is none the less a pressing question now. And I can not understand how any man with the heart of a patriot in his breast can help treating it as a pressing, nay, an imperative question always.

Mr. Chairman, last week I saw in the daily press a paragraph which must have arrested the eyes of many members of this House. It was a statement that a small force of French troops had been attacked by a force of Chinamen. The news came from Paris, and it was accompanied by the further statement that in retaliation for this outrage France would undoubtedly order the bombardment of all the cities on the coast of China. Doubtless France has the power to issue and execute such an order. But to me, an American, that paragraph brought a sensation of shame; for I could not but remember that an order might be issued by France and executed by her fleet to bombard all the large cities on our coast.

I have already stated upon the floor of the House that there is not a dwelling, that there is not a building in my district which is not within the reach of guns of vessels lying in the open sea, and there is not in the harbor and fortifications of New York one single gun which could be used offensively against a fleet stationed off Coney Island. China has pursued the policy of non-resistance, and when I listened to the humane gentleman from Indiana I wondered whether he had not drawn some lessons in political conduct from Chinese statesmen. Rely upon moral forces! Certainly we have always relied upon moral forces, and moral forces are the chief defense of our country. But men have found that those moral forces were the most powerful and most effective in action when they were in the strong hands of brave men willing to fight in their defense and advocacy. Providence goes with the moral forces, but has a singular partiality for the strongest battalions.

I suppose that China finds it more economical not to maintain armies and fleets and fortifications. Doubtless she can afford out of her dense population of 280,000,000 to lose a few thousand of her people now and then rather than go to the expense of building fleets and training armies. But what has been the result of this long policy of submission to every foreign invader? China found a better defense in the walls she built against the Tartar invaders than she did in the strong arms of her own soldiery. And during our lifetime we have seen every European power that chose to have a controversy with that country hold Chinese cities at their mercy. It is only a few years ago since the loot from the imperial palace filled the bric-a-brac shops of London and Paris. It is only a few years ago since the forts at the mouth of one of her great rivers were bombarded and her cities taken.

I suppose that a Chinese statesman addressing a Chinese house of representatives might say: "Certainly we have suffered these things, but then see what money we have saved; these Western barbarians expend hundreds of millions." He might then sum up the amounts: "Germany so many millions; France so many millions; England so many millions; and we, the children of the sun, we have saved all this money; true enough, we have lost some lives; true enough, we have received some cuffs; but we have saved the money; we have relied upon moral forces and moral suasion and saved our money; we have held ourselves up as an example to mankind." Yes, indeed, they have, but not an example which the American people want to follow. For the result of a thousand years of this civilization is that China is the only country that we single out whose people we by our laws exclude from our shores. The qualities which make nations great in war lie at the basis of all manly qualities, and from that strong soil all civilization and freedom grow. And God forbid that my country shall ever neglect them or ever cease to honor them. [Applause.]

We are told that we must not spend $3,000,000 to begin fortifying our coasts. Why not? Have we not the money? What is to be done with this vast tide of money which the monstrous and overgrown taxation of the country is turning into our Treasury? Every effort in this House to reduce taxation has failed. I do not recollect one single tax which has been reduced to the amount of one single penny.

When I go home to meet my constituents and they ask what has been accomplished, I shall be able to say to them that $600 was saved by cutting down the salaries of three secretaries of legation, and that $2,000 more was saved by cutting down the salary of our minister in Rome. But when the artisans of my district turn to me and say, "What tax did you throw off by reason of this enormous reduction of expenditure," what answer shall I make? I will have no answer to make at all. The remorseless machinery of taxation is still at work. Every day their proportion of $100,000,000 of unnecessary taxes will be ground out of the artisans of my district in the coming year as they have been in the past. Nor do I believe, and I say it to the leaders of my side of the House, that my constituents will be at all consoled by the circumstance that $600 was saved from the salaries of secretaries of legation and $2,000 cut off from the salary of the richest young man in America.

I will tell you one use you can put money to which will be received with satisfaction everywhere, not only in the seacoast cities most threatened, not alone in the cities upon the lakes and the great rivers which share the danger, because the feelings which I express, I believe, are to be found in the heart of every true American wherever you find him, even in the mines of Colorado. You can put a little of this money to a most beneficent and patriotic use. You can use it to put our harbors and rivers in a state of defense, so that they may not be at the mercy of every foreign power.

Gentlemen tell us that there are no questions now existing to disturb our relations with other countries. There are doubtless no such questions disturbing our relations with other countries; but our fathers did not see fit to let the question of peace or war rest solely upon the will of a foreign power. That was a matter about which they wanted to have something to say themselves. The difficulty with our present policy is that we leave the question whether there shall be peace or war to be decided by the foreigner.

How near we may be to such questions I may illustrate by referring to a historic circumstance within my knowledge, although not within general knowledge: I happen to know that when the American minister in 1865 carried to the French minister of foreign affairs a demand for the withdrawal of the French army from Mexico the French minister turned to him and said, "How many troops has your Government in Texas?" Said the American minister, "There are 200,000 men on the Rio Grande under the command of General Sheridan." Who can doubt that the moral suasion which our minister used in his argument, addressed to ancient relations and repeated treaties of friendship cemented by successful war, was greatly re-enforced by the fact that 200,000 tried soldiers under the command of a competent officer were ready to obey the command of our Government?

I do not wish to refer to what might possibly cause differences between our country and other countries. But I should suppose that this House might find some reason for caution in arriving at the conclusion that peace would be perpetual here by recalling how slight a circumstance at the beginning of this session has brought about the result that the American minister is withdrawn from Berlin and the German minister has been withdrawn from Washington. National relations always rest upon uncertain grounds. Friendships such as bind individuals to each other, the ties of family, the ties of relationship do not exist between nations. Interest, passion, nay, in many instances, even the ambition of a man or the caprice of a woman has been sufficient to bring about protracted wars.

Let me refer to one circumstance. A person must have been careless who has not observed the change which has been brought about in the relations of European powers by the construction of the Suez Canal. Does anybody who reads the papers to-day doubt not only that the fate of the British ministry depends upon the policy of its premier toward the country through which that canal has been constructed, but that the peace of Europe also depends upon the policy of England as to the same subject?

And what may not happen when we find that the only channel of water communication across this hemisphere is in the hands of a foreign power? I do not undertake in particular to predict what will happen, but this I venture to say: that no sooner shall such a water way be constructed than we will find that it is quite as important to us, to our commerce, to our prosperity, and to our greatness as the Mississippi itself; and that with reference to the government and control of this canal this country will have a great deal to say to all other countries.

I hope we shall always be able to find our relations with foreign governments those of friendship. But I propose that this House shall do what will be most effectual to keep those relations friendly by making not an extravagant but a proper and timely appropriation for warlike defense. [Applause.]

Mr. HORR. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7440) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 1, 1884.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate for its second reading a Senate joint resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], the title of which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. R. 96) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase United States trade-dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. How does that come up, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is laid before the Senate by the Chair. The question is on the second reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. What has become of the routine morning business, the presentation of petitions, &c.?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it to be the duty of the Chair, under the rules, first to lay before the Senate bills that are objected to on a preceding day on their first reading. The question now is, Will the Senate agree to the second reading of the joint resolution?

Mr. INGALLS. What is the title of the measure?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the joint resolution be read the second time.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a new way. I should be glad to understand that way, because whenever I want a bill to supersede everything else I shall now know how to do it. It is a new device.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair studied the question on a former occasion in order to know what should be done with House bills objected to on their second reading, and other matters.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is this a House bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Chair is only explaining the ground of his opinion, that his opinion was formed before this measure came up, and the practice as he understood it under the existing rule settled it. That is, when a House bill or a Senate bill is objected to on its second reading upon the day it is offered it goes over under the rule and lies on the table of the Chair, and is presented (as a resolution is when it is objected to on a previous day when the order of resolutions is reached) for its second reading, if the Senate choose to order it to be read a second time.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that as there is evidently less than a quorum present he postpone this matter until after the presentation of petitions and the reports of committees.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair be good enough to have read the rule which makes an explanation to Rule VII, relating to the order of business, this not being a resolution from the House but a resolution introduced yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It is a joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, an ordinary joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know of any specific phrase in the rules which makes the exception the Senator from Massachusetts suggests in respect of bills the second reading of which is objected to. The Chair is to lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives at any time. They must be read three times under the rules, precisely like Senate bills, the rule making no distinction. On consultation several weeks ago, or months ago the Chair may say, as to what would happen under the existing rules of the Senate in case of the second reading of a bill being objected to, whether it would go on the Calendar or would lie over under the rule for the question of its second reading to be determined on the next day, the Chair came to the conclusion, after consultation with some gentlemen and he thinks with the Committee on Rules, that the regular practice would be for an objected House bill or an objected Senate bill or an objected Senate resolution going over for its next stage on the next day, to lay it before the Senate at the appropriate time. The Chair supposes that as in the case of House bills it would be at this time. The opinion of the Chair therefore is formed upon previous consideration and consultation that it is in order to lay the bill before the Senate at this time.

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will pardon me, it seems to me that the Chair has not adverted to the distinction between a House bill and a Senate bill in that particular. Rule VII is explicit. It provides that—

> After the Journal is read, the presiding officer shall lay before the Senate, messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments, and other communications addressed to the Senate; and such bills, joint resolutions, and other messages from the House of Representatives as may remain upon his table from any previous day's session undisposed of.

That of course does not mean Senate bills. The language is "bills, joint resolutions, and other messages from the House of Representatives" which have not yet been taken up and disposed of in any way. So the conclusion to which the Chair came some time ago in regard to bills from the House, to which he refers, is unquestionably correct and clearly supported by the very letter of the rule itself. Rule VII proceeds:

> The presiding officer shall then call for, in the following order:
> The presentation of petitions and memorials;
> Reports of standing and select committees;
> The introduction of bills and joint resolutions; &c.

My question is, upon what can the Chair support, in the face of that express rule, a direction that a Senate bill read a first time yesterday, to which its reading on a subsequent stage was objected to, should displace the ordinary morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is possible the Chair is mistaken in supposing that this present moment of time, when ordinarily petitions would be called for, is the one at which he should have laid the bill before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. That is the point I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is very possible that in analogy with a practice that the Senate has acquiesced in, the Chair believes unanimously, of laying an objected resolution before the Senate when Senate resolutions are called for, it will be more appropriate for the Chair to lay this joint resolution before the Senate when the order of the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is reached. The Chair is inclined to think he was in that respect in error; and he will therefore withhold the bill until the call for bills and joint resolutions is reached, when the Chair will again lay it before the Senate and the Senate will decide what the order shall be.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I will wait till then.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petitions of Augustus Francis Luving, late a private in Company B, Ninety-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present the petition of A. Miller, a delegate from the Stockbridge Nation of Indians in Wisconsin, praying for certain relief. As the matter referred to in the petition is now pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs, I move that the petition be printed as a document and referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, with an amendment. The amendment is simply the substitution of a Senate bill which has already passed this body with the exception of the words in reference to the site, "unless the same be donated." I ask for its present consideration, as it is a matter upon which the Senate has acted, in view of moving the Senate bill as an amendment to the House bill so that a committee of conference may act upon it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read and then the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that the Secretary read merely the substitute, which is very near like the House bill. That would answer the purpose, if the Senator from Indiana has no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. If it would be in order I ask that the reading of the bill proposed to be stricken out be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Connecticut ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill proposed to be stricken out be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment recommended by the committee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

> That the Board of Managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are hereby authorized and directed to locate a branch of the home at some suitable point in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska. The same shall not be located on a tract of land less than three hundred and twenty acres in extent.
> SEC. 2. That said branch home shall be located and the ground purchased unless the same be donated by said board of managers within three months, or as soon thereafter as practicable, from the approval of this act: Provided, That said board of managers may select any Government property suitable for such home, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War.
>
> SEC. 3. That the Board of Managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is hereby authorized to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch of the home in the State of California for the Pacific coast; and to that end the said board is authorized to receive propositions from the managers of the "Veterans' Home," located in Napa County, California, for the transfer of the buildings, grounds, and property of said "Veterans' Home" to the United States, for use as a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and to report to Congress in respect to the propriety and expediency of accepting said "Veterans' Home" for such branch; but this section shall not interfere with the establishing of the home provided for in this act. And also that the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch soldiers' home in the State of Michigan, and also as to the use of the Fort Dearborn military reservation, and the building thereon, for that purpose, and to report to Congress thereon at an early day; but this provision shall not interfere with the establishment of the home provided for in this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes."

MRS. MARY ROSS.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

> Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Mary Ross, widow of James Ross, deceased, late an employé of the Senate, the sum of $161.50 for funeral expenses, out of the contingent fund.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGES AT SAINT PAUL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the House bill which came over yesterday in regard to the Saint Paul bridge be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 2243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota. The message from the House accompanying the bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 30, 1884.
> Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 2243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 3, with amendments as follows:

In the first line strike out "rafts."

In the second and fifth lines strike out "water crafts" and insert "water craft."

Also, strike out the words "costs and damages of the common council of the city of Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota," and insert in lieu thereof "expense of the city of Saint Paul, or of the persons or corporations constructing, owning, or operating said bridge;" and that the House agree to the same.

O. D. CONGER,

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
BENJAMIN HARRISON,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. S. ROSECRANS,
CHAS. H. MORGAN,
GEORGE W. STEELE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

REMOVAL OF CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is on the Calendar a bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion. It is a very important measure; probably there are constituents of every Senator interested in it; and in order that it may become a law at the present session it ought to receive immediate consideration. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill. The Committee on Military Affairs have given it full consideration and have reported certain amendments, and with these amendments recommend the passage of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 11, after the words "eighteen hundred and sixty-five," to insert "having previously served six months or more;" so as to make the section read:

That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the Office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that any such soldier served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 1st day of May, A. D. 1865, having previously served six months or more, or was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty, but who, by absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri what he means by serving in the Army. Does he mean actual service with the command or in hospital? I think the section ought to be amended so as to make it "actual service with his command."

Mr. COCKRELL. He could not serve anywhere else.

Mr. SEWELL. He might have served in hospital.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would not be service.

Mr. SEWELL. That is exactly what I wish to know, what construction the Senator puts on the language?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it is liable to but one interpretation, and that is that he served with his command, the only place where he could have properly served.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose he was detailed?

Mr. LOGAN. I was just going to suggest, suppose he was on what is called detached service?

Mr. SEWELL. That would be with his command practically because under the order of his command, but suppose he dropped out as a straggler and got to a hospital, he would be still on the rolls of the company and still in service.

Mr. LOGAN. That is a different proposition.

Mr. SEWELL. Those are the men we do not want to get the benefit of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the charge of desertion standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall also be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such soldier charged with desertion or with absence without leave, and after such charge of desertion or absence without leave, voluntarily returned to his command, and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service, and received a certificate of honorable discharge.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to remove the charge of desertion from the records of any soldier in the late war upon proper application therefor and satisfactory proof in the following cases:

First. That such soldier, after such charge of desertion was made, and within a reasonable time thereafter, voluntarily returned to the service and served faithfully to the end of his term of service.

Second. That such soldier absented himself without proper authority from hospital, or from furlough given from hospital, while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the service in the line of duty, and on recovery voluntarily returned to the service, and served faithfully until discharged, or died from such wounds, injury, or disease while so absent and before the date of the muster out of his command.

Third. That such soldier absented himself without proper authority from furlough given by proper authority, and while so absent died from wounds, injury, or disease received or contracted in the service in the line of duty before the muster out of his command.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Missouri whether it would not be wise to add to the first class of cases the case of a person who, after a charge of desertion, re-enlisted in another branch of the service. You only make it apply to those cases where he returned and served out his term of service. I submit if he re-enlisted and went into the service it should work the same effect as though he returned to the particular regiment to which he was formerly attached.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would depend upon whether he re-enlisted for bounty and received it. We considered all these questions in the commiteee carefully and thoroughly. It is impossible in one bill to provide for each individual case. You can not make a general law that will be applicable and relieve every isolated case; there will be exceptions. We have in this bill included all the classes that we think ought to be relieved by a general law. It may be necessary hereafter, after cases have been developed, to pass another general law relieving other classes, but this is as far as the committee thought it was prudent or right to go now.

Mr. LAPHAM. I shall not press an amendment after that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in section 4, line 4, before the word "pay," to strike out "all" and insert "the;" and in line 5, after "bounty," to strike out "which may have been withheld on account of such charge of desertion or absence without leave" and insert "due to such soldiers;" so as to read:

That when the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier, or, in case of his death, the heirs or legal representatives of such soldier shall receive the pay and bounty due to such soldier.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 8, after "soldier," to strike out "as may be entitled to relief under the provisions of this act;" in line 10, after "soldier," to strike out "the right to receive," and insert "any;" in line 11, before "bounty," to strike out "and," and after "bounty" to insert "or allowance;" in line 13, after "without," to strike out "leave of absence: And provided further, That no," and insert "proper authority; nor shall it be so construed as to give any pay, bounty, or allowance to any;" in line 15, after "soldier," to strike out "nor the" and insert "is;" in line 16, after "representatives," to strike out "of any soldier," and to strike out all the section after the word "months," in line 17, in the following words:

Shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act. That the provisions of this act shall apply also to the soldiers of the war of 1812, Black Hawk war, and the war with Mexico.

So as to make the proviso read:

That this act shall not be so construed as to give to any such soldier, or, in case of his death, to the heirs or legal representatives of any such soldier, any pay, bounty, or allowance for any period of time during which such soldier was absent from his command without proper authority; nor shall it be so construed as to give any pay, bounty, or allowance to any soldier, his heirs or legal representatives who served in the Army a period of less than six months.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert, as section 5, the following:

SEC. 5. That all applications for relief under this act shall be made to and filed with the Secretary of War within the period of three years from and after its passage, and all applications not so made and filed within said term of three years shall be forever barred and shall not be received or considered.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri, who has charge of the bill, why we should make a limitation of three years?

Mr. COCKRELL. Because it has been usual in all these cases to make limitations so as to cause the claims to come in and have them settled and not leave them indefinitely. If they are filed within the time fixed they can be considered at any time afterward if they are not concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest, if a limitation is necessary (and I do not question that; such is not my purpose in what I have to say), that it be made longer. This body of people are scattered all over the country, some of them are out of the country, and there ought to be ample time for them, so that we shall not hereafter be obliged to refuse to extend the time for those who have been a little bit tardy. I suggest to my friend from Missouri, and I know he is as liberal as anybody, that the limitation be made five years.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to three, four, or five years so far as that is concerned, but there ought to be a limitation as there is in all such cases.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the amendment in section 5, line 3, by striking out "three" and inserting "five" before "years;" so as to read:

That all applications for relief under this act shall be made to and filed with the Secretary of War within the period of five years from and after its passage.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. To make the section correspond, I move in line 4, before the word "years," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to read:

And all applications not so made and filed within said term of five years shall be forever barred and shall not be received or considered.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I see in the first section, in regard to the date fixed for the service of the soldier, the language is that any soldier who "served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 1st day of May, 1865." It seems to me that that date is too early. There were troops in the field after the 1st day of May, 1865. The grand review in Washington took place on the 22d and 23d of May. I suggest that the date should be fixed on the 1st of June, if not later.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state to the Senator from California that the question of date has been fully discussed. We already have a valid existing law in the same language of the bill except that it fixes the 22d day of May. That was the date fixed in the bill which passed a year ago last August, which by reason of some amendment failed to be operative. The committee thought it better to fix the 1st day of May instead of the 22d, as it is in the existing law. It will not reach what the committee desire to reach if you defer it to the 1st of June. It would cut out hundreds of meritorious cases that occurred prior to that time. Therefore I do not think it would be right to put it off so late as the 1st of June.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Is it not possible in fixing the date at the 1st of May that soldiers will have this relief who actually deserted in presence of the enemy, because the war was not then over?

Mr. COCKRELL. No soldier who actually deserted can be relieved under the bill. It is not to relieve deserters; it is only to relieve soldiers charged with desertion and not guilty of it. There is no authority here to relieve any actual deserter from the crime of desertion; it is only to relieve soldiers who are improperly charged with the crime of desertion from that charge, not from the truth of it. We have made a distinction between deserters and those who may be improperly charged with desertion. There is now no tribunal before which these soldiers can have the charge of desertion tried. We make a tribunal, and that is the Secretary of War, and it is for the purpose of enabling him to remove the charges but not to avoid the heinous crime of desertion that the bill is pressed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill as passed and as it will be sent to the House be printed so that the House can have it in the form in which it has passed.

The motion was agreed to.

CATHARINE H. GLICK.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask leave to offer, now out of order, the following resolution in regard to a bill that has passed the House and the return of which I desire.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias B. Glick, deceased, the bill having passed the Senate June 27, 1884.

I have conferred with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL], chairman of the Committee on Pensions, in relation to it. The purpose is to pass the House bill, which is here. We passed the Senate bill, which will not be acted on by the House. I desire the Senate bill to be returned, and then that we pass the House bill so that it may become a law.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

GENERAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the rules and articles of war, to report it with amendments. I ask unanimous consent, as it is a very important bill and very short, that the Senate take it up now. It will occupy but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs were in line 5, after the word "army," to insert "a territorial division or a department;" and in line 7 to change the word "court-martial" to "courts-martial."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like now to have the bill read, just as it stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the third time as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

That article 72 of the Articles of War be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"ART. 72. Any general officer commanding an army, a territorial division, or a department, or colonel commanding a separate department, may appoint general courts-martial whenever necessary. But when any such commander is the accuser or prosecutor of any officer under his command the court shall be appointed by the President; and its proceedings and sentence shall be sent directly to the Secretary of War, by whom they shall be laid before the President for his approval or orders in the case."

The bill was passed.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports from committees that order of business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution introduced yesterday and read the first time, its second reading having been objected to.

The Chief Clerk read by its title the joint resolution (S. R. 96) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase United States trade-dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall this joint resolution be read the second time?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move the second reading of it.

WIDOW OF GENERAL STEEDMAN.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will not the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to call up and have passed a pension bill in behalf of the widow of General James B. Steedman? It is a House bill, and I understand a single day of pay under the bill is a matter of vital importance to her and three small children. I promised some friends in Ohio and I promised myself, as I knew General Steedman well, and he was a hero, to secure the early passage of the bill. I want the Senate to consent to allow me to pass the bill to-day. If I have the Senator's consent I will ask the Senate to take it up and consider it. It is House bill 1246.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. All I desire is that the joint resolution which I offered yesterday shall be before the Senate. If that is before the Senate I have no objection to yielding temporarily.

Mr. VOORHEES. It shall be only temporarily, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent, pending the joint resolution laid before the Senate, that it be laid aside informally, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for placing the name of Mrs. Margaret Steedman, widow of the late Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman, upon the pension-list at $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not inclined to object to the bill, but I call attention to the fact that the Committee on Pensions has a number of bills that in my opinion are equally deserving, and one in which I feel a warm personal interest in behalf of the widow of a man whose name was honorably borne on the roll of the United States Army for fifty-six years, and the Committee on Pensions holds those bills resolutely in its fist and will not report them, or else reports adversely. Now, what is fish for one should be fish for the other. Let us have fair play in this matter.

Mr. BLAIR. I want the bill to pass, and it will pass, I have not the slightest doubt. The Senate is ready to pass all the bills on which the committee has been divided. Three have already passed and the Steedman case makes four. General Moore's is one equally meritorious, and I do not doubt the Senate will make what is fish for one fish for the others.

Mr. WILSON. This bill comes within the rule upon which the committee, since I have been a member of it, has uniformly acted; that is, refusing to increase the rate of pension allowed in cases of this kind under the general law, where they come within it, from $30 to $50 a month. I do not recall now a single case which we have reported otherwise than adversely where this question was involved.

Mr. BLAIR. The committee, I think, owing to a misunderstanding, during the present session has acted somewhat inconsistently with itself, but it declined formerly to increase the pensions of the widows of officers of high rank in the Army, and never allowed it unless it appeared that there was some requirement for an increase in order that they might live in comfortable circumstances. As one member of the committee I have uniformly refused to vote for the increase unless in the most exceptional cases, and I have insisted that it should be shown as an additional factor in the case that there is a necessity of further aid from the Government. The case of the widow of General Steedman and also of the widow of General Moore are both cases in which the widows are in actual need of further assistance from the Government.

Mr. PLATT. I understand the committee have reported favorably in this case. Am I right?

Mr. BLAIR. They have reported favorably in this case.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the passage of this bill in favor of the widow of General Steedman I think is right, and I only want to say here that as gallant a man as ever drew a sword on a battlefield on earth as a major-general in the Federal Army died leaving a widow who is in need. Maj. Gen. E. O. C. Ord I refer to. The House passed a bill giving his widow a pension of $50 a month. The Senate committee cut it down to $30. I believe with the Senator from Connecticut in making no distinction between fish and flesh in this matter, and whenever the proper time comes I shall propose to give Mrs. Ord $50 a month; and she ought to have it.

Mr. BLAIR. There is a favorable report in the case of the widow of General Ord, if I recollect correctly. At all events it is one of those cases where I have not the slightest doubt the bill will be passed by the Senate, and Senators are simply obstructing their own desires by these objections to cases as they come up.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, let us pass this bill.

The bill was passed.

TRADE-DOLLARS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs, Shall the joint resolution (S. R. 96) introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase United States trade-dollars be read a second time?
